

Library of Congress.

Chap. BS 1556

Shelf .T3

Copyright No.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

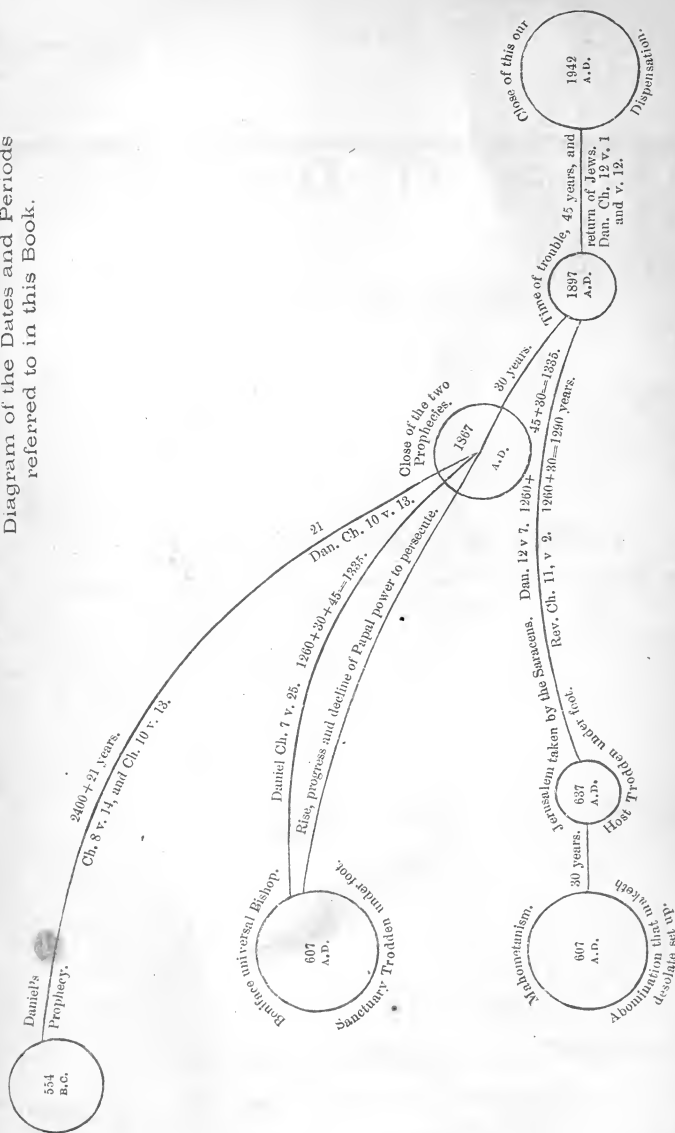

554
B.C.

C. 2564 B'

THE
TIMES OF DANIEL.
AN ARGUMENT.

BY
HENRY W. TAYLOR, LL.D., LATE A JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT AND JUDGE OF THE COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK.

NEW YORK:
ANSON D. F. RANDOLPH & CO.,
770 BROADWAY, COR. 9TH STREET.
1871.

BS1556
T3

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1871, by
ANSON D. F. RANDOLPH & CO.,
In the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

E. O. JENKINS,
STEREOTYPER AND PRINTER,
20 N. WILLIAM ST., N. Y.

SYNOPSIS.

---

CHAPTER I.

Prefatory .....	9
-----------------	---

CHAPTER II.

Introductory .....	17
--------------------	----

CHAPTER III.

Announcement of the Messiah .....	23
-----------------------------------	----

CHAPTER IV.

Subjection of the Saints to Antichrist .....	26
--	----

CHAPTER V.

The Answer of Palmoni. 2400 Years.....	36
--	----

CHAPTER VI.

Chronological Corrections.....	43
--------------------------------	----

CHAPTER VII.

Addition of 21 to the 2400 Years.....	49
---------------------------------------	----

CHAPTER VIII.

Symbol of the Ram with Horns.....	56
Note to Chapter viii.....	63

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER IX.

Symbol of the He-goat.....	73
----------------------------	----

CHAPTER X.

Somewhat more of the Ram and He-goat.....	82
---	----

CHAPTER XI.

The Holy City trodden down of the Gentiles 1260 years.....	104
--	-----

CHAPTER XII.

The same subject continued.....	109
---------------------------------	-----

CHAPTER XIII.

The Restoration of the Jews.....	115
----------------------------------	-----

CHAPTER XIV.

The same subject continued .....	120
----------------------------------	-----

CHAPTER XV.

The Twelfth Chapter of Daniel.....	130
------------------------------------	-----

CHAPTER XVI.

1290 and 1335 Years.....	139
--------------------------	-----

CHAPTER XVII.

Twelfth Chapter—Twelfth Verse .....	144
-------------------------------------	-----

CHAPTER XVIII.

The Close of the Christian Dispensation.....	148
--	-----

CHAPTER XIX.

Corroborative proofs from other Scriptures.....	153
---	-----

SYNOPSIS.

5

CHAPTER XX.

Third Chapter, Second of Peter, Tenth Verse ..... 165

CHAPTER XXI.

The Answer of Christ to his Disciples—Matt. Chapter xxiv ... 177

CHAPTER XXII.

The Coming of our Lord..... 187

CHAPTER XXIII.

The Millennium..... 193

CHAPTER XXIV.

Summary and Conclusion..... 200

TO THE READER.

IT is a natural presumption on the part of the reader of this argument, that its preparation was prompted by the recent wonderful developments which have signalized the history of Europe.

So far from that, the whole argument, excepting the tenth chapter, and the note to the eighth, was in manuscript, with the design of immediate publication, near four years ago.

Some may think they discover a discrepancy of one or two years, between the time when certain events ought to have occurred, according to my system, and their actual occurrence. The writer admits no such discrepancy, beyond that resulting from probable errors in certain ancient chronological eras.

The fixing dates to the fulfillment of Daniel's prophecy, has become a somewhat unpopular enterprise. In the commencement of this argument, the writer had no premeditated design of placing the final dates where they are found. But this feature in the case, is only the necessary sequence of the argument. The writer would be just as well satisfied if his reasoning had led to different results.

The radical principle of the theory presented is, that the last six chapters of Daniel, (except perhaps the first seven verses of the seventh chapter, which are necessarily introductory,) are devoted exclusively to visions relating to the Christian dispensation; and in this consists my fundamental divergence from all former systems of exegesis of this prophecy.

CHAPTER I.

PREFATORY.

IT is many years since I became distrustful of some of the prevalent notions concerning the prophecy of Daniel. All the commentaries I had seen appeared to leave it deficient in some respects, in symmetry and system; and indeed, to blend together those things, especially relating to time, which ought to be kept separate; assuming, for instance, that as two terms of time were of the same duration, they therefore begin and end at the same period. As the leading example, I quote from Faber: "At the end of 1260 days, the judgment will sit, and the dominion of the papal horn, or the little horn of the fourth beast, will be utterly destroyed by the Son of man: at the end of the same 1260 days, the king, who magnified himself above every god, will undertake the expedition, which will terminate in his destruction; and at that very time, the restoration of the Jews will commence. At the end of the same 1260 days, the ten-horned beast, which was to practice prosperously in his revived state forty-two prophetic months, and along with him, his false prophet, will be ultimately, that is, at the end of those forty-two months, defeated in a great battle with the personal word of God ; and lastly, the man of sin will finally, and therefore, at the end of the same 1260 days, be consumed with the spirit of the mouth of the Lord, and destroyed with the brightness of his coming." To the same purport Mr. Whiston, in his Essay on the Revelation of St. John, at page 76: "Not only the necessity of chronological synchronisms, but the evident force of common reason obliges us to acquiesce, and to esteem these five several prophecies, in the main, collateral and contemporary."

A more careful examination has convinced me that errors have crept in, not only in the application of the prophet's developments to chronology, but in the generally accepted chronology itself. With very few variations, I wrote the four chapters of this essay, commencing with the third, more than five years ago, and subsequent investigation on my part, and events in the ecclesiastical world, have tended very much to strengthen my former convictions.

Following the lead of the most eminent writers on Daniel, I had assumed the year 606 as that in which Boniface was constituted supreme Pontiff. More careful research, however, has satisfied me that this is an error. He was, undoubtedly, thus created Universal Bishop in 607, which epoch I have accordingly adopted. This, in itself, is a small matter, but as it is the epoch from which nearly every event foretold by Daniel is reckoned, it becomes desirable that it should be fixed, as far as possible, with perfect exactness. In a matter the value of which depends so much upon chronological accuracy, as in this prophecy, I have been surprised to discover so many most obvious and momentous defects.

The ninth chapter commences as follows: "In the first year of Darius the Mede." This has been assumed, I know not upon what hypothesis, to have been the year 538 before Christ, and is so noted in all the bibles having marginal references. We inquire who "Darius the Mede," was, and learn that he was undoubtedly identical with Cyaxeres, the son and successor of Astyages. Rollin, in his second volume, at page 97, sec. 3, of his history of Cyrus, says: "Astyages, king of the Medes, dying, was succeeded by his son Cyaxeres, brother to Cyrus' mother." This he dates 560 B. C. A writer in Rees' Cyclopædia, says: "Astyages, after a reign of thirty-five years, was succeeded by his son, Cyaxeres, 560 B. C., who in the book of Daniel is called, 'Darius the Mede.'" Calmet says, "Darius the Mede, spoken of in Daniel, was son of Astyages, king of the Medes, and brother of Mandane, mother of Cyrus, and Amyit the mother of Evil Merodach, and grandmother of Belshazzar. The Hebrew names him Dariovesch, or Darius; the Septuagint Artaxerxes, and Xenophon Cyaxeres." There can be no doubt that Cyaxares, or Darius, was king of the Medes 560 B. C. It is presumed that the date of 538, as the first year of Darius the Mede, was adopted on the authority of Archbishop Usher, who under that date, says: "Darius the Mede, son of Assuaras al. Cyaxares, the son of Astyages, took upon him the kingdom, delivered to him by Cyrus, the Conqueror." No other authority has been found, and it does not appear certain that the archbishop, himself, ever countenanced this application, as it is found in our bibles.

On the contrary, he in another place says, at the year before Christ, 560, "In the kingdom of Media, upon the decease of Astyages, called Assueras, succeeded his son, Cyaxeres, Cyrus' mother's brother, as Xenophon says, to wit: in the beginning of the first year of the 55th Olympiad, thirty-one years before the decease of Cyrus, which Cyaxeres, Daniel calleth, Darius the Mede."

It would seem just as absurd to call the year 538 the first year of Darius the Mede, because he received an addition to his kingdom in that year, as it would to call 1867 the first year of William, King of Prussia, because in that year he added large provinces to his former kingdom. This mistake has led to serious errors. The compiler of Daniel's visions, has evidently intended to arrange them in the order of their appearance. He has placed this ninth chapter after the seventh and eighth, which is right, according to the received chronology, while, if this correction be made, it would properly be placed before those chapters, and thus give to the whole prophecy a symmetry, which appears to be wanting, as it now stands.

Daniel's visions, commencing with the ninth chapter, followed by the seventh and eighth, and so on to the close, constitute one continuous prophecy, foreshadowing the most important matters, touching the ministry and sacrifice of our Savior, and the progress, discouragements, and final triumph of God's people; nearly all under symbolical forms, from the birth of Christ to the close of the Christian dispensation; and they relate to nothing else, except so far as is necessary to elucidate their history.

Taking this view of the case, his first vision, as recorded in the ninth chapter, initiates the whole prophecy, by giving a brief account of the coming ministry and death of our Savior, and of the sufferings of the Jews, very soon thereafter, under Titus and Adrian. In the vision recorded in the seventh chapter, he had a general view of the church, until the close of the Christian dispensation; and also a more particular one of the delivery of the saints into the power of antichrist, with an account of the duration of their subjection.

In the eighth chapter he gives a more particular account of the power into whose hands the saints were to be delivered, under the similitude of the ram with horns, with a statement of the time when their subjection to this antichristian power should cease; and also introduces the he-goat and little horn towards the south, which became exceedingly great, symbolizing the twin apostacy of Mahometanism.

In the tenth chapter he merely corrects matter which might possibly mislead; or, rather gives more minute information as to the 2400 years mentioned in the eighth chapter, which was liable, as it stood, to possible misapprehension.

The eleventh chapter, in the commencement, brings forward again the he-goat, as a mighty king, and his successors, and ends with the overthrow of Mahometanism in the Holy Land.

The twelfth chapter gives us, in its opening, in the briefest form, an epitome of wonderful events to occur immediately preceding the final consummation: as the restoration of the Jews; the time of unspeakable tribulation; the resurrection of some from the dead; and after giving several specifications of time, and their duration, closes with the announcement of final bliss, or the commencement of the millennium.

As the times, relating to different events, have been unfortunately blended together, to the great confusion of the prophecy, so it seems to me, certain great events have been confounded with each other, only because in describing these events, having a similarity in characteristics, the prophet has used similar language. The idea of "desolation," or "abomination of desolation," appears four times in Daniel. In the ninth chapter, it evidently refers to the destruction of Jerusalem, under Titus and Adrian. In the eighth, as clearly to the delivery of the saints into the power of antichrist. In the eleventh, to the desecration of Jerusalem and the Holy Land by the Mahometans, Saracens and Turks, and in the twelfth, to the same as the eighth, the delivery of the saints into subjection to the anti-christian power, and to the birth of Mahometanism.

It will be inferred from these prefatory remarks, that my interpretation of this prophecy of Daniel will differ essentially from those which have heretofore received the popular approbation.

CHAPTER II.

INTRODUCTORY.

THERE are certain events foretold in the Scriptures with such precision, and repeated so often and with such steady assurance, that one finds it difficult to exercise proper faith in them, as a divine revelation, and at the same time doubt their literal fulfillment; especially as such fulfillment involves far less of difficulty than any of the explanations which seek to evade such results.

Nearly all Christians believe that the Mahometan delusion will come to an end at no distant period of time; and this faith is a legitimate result from those lights which emanate from Divine revelation. So, too, all Protestants believe that the power of the Romish Hierarchy will vanish at about the same time; and their faith is drawn from the same source.

But there are other events foretold in the same

Scriptures, with equal force and exactness, and constantly repeated, about which our notions are vague, even if many sincere Christians have not ceased to believe at all, falling back upon the old skepticism—"Where is the promise of His coming?"

More than one hundred years ago a large number of intelligent and devout believers, drawing their inferences from a very careful study of the Scriptures, entertained no doubt that the year of our Lord, 1747, would unfold wonderful developments in the fulfillment of Scripture prophecy. Assuming their premises to have been correct, their anticipations were, doubtless, well-founded; while that year witnessed the occurrence of no event that at all corresponded with such anticipations.

They grounded their reckoning upon the answer of one saint, or Palmoni, the wonderful numberer, to the question of the other, as stated in the 13th verse of the 8th chapter of Daniel. "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice?" etc. According to the ordinary computation, assuming the supposed date of the prophetic vision to be correct, 2300 days (or as is generally understood, years) would have ended in that year, 1747.

The anticipated event did not occur, and on account of the failure of this anticipation, and of others, seemingly, not so well founded, but little confidence has since been placed in any interpretations of the times of this prophecy; and this want of faith has been constantly growing, until one would imagine that nearly the whole Christian world had become skeptical as to the explicit revelations of the prophet. I think I shall have shown, in the course of this argument, a very satisfactory reason for the disappointments of 1747; while those anticipations were well founded, after making due allowance for certain chronological errors.

The design of this argument is to ascertain, so far as may be done, the time when,

First, The antichristian despotism of the Roman Hierarchy shall come to its end.

Second, The Mahometan delusion shall die away, and disappear, so far at least as the Holy Land is concerned.

Third, The restoration of the Jews to Palestine shall be accomplished.

Fourth, Shall be the coming of our Lord, and

Fifth, The Millennium shall begin; several of which events have been too often confounded together, and with the anticipated end of the world.

In the course of this discussion, some other matters of great moment will necessarily be brought in; but as their development necessarily depends upon one or another of the above events, I have not thought desirable to specify them.

The doctrine of the restoration of the Jews has been believed in all ages of the church ; but probably, in no age, has so little been said and thought and prayed about it, as the present, when the predicted event is just upon us.

All the prophets are full of such declarations as this from the thirty-sixth chapter of Ezekiel and the twenty-fourth verse, "I will take you from among the heathen, and will gather you out of all countries, and will bring you into your own land." So in the thirty-seventh chapter, and the twenty-first and second verses, "I will take the children of Israel, from among the heathen, and bring them into their own land ; I will make them one nation in the land, upon the mountains of Israel ; and one king shall be king to them all ; and they no more shall be two nations." Passages of similar import are scattered through the books of the prophets, and in such positive and varied terms, as to leave no excuse or palliation for unbelief.

The coming of our Lord is affirmed or assumed in every possible form of expression, so varied, so full, so intelligible, by so many persons, beginning with our Lord himself, and repeated by him at least seven times ; in the Acts of the Apostles ; in the Epistle to the Corinthians; in every chapter of both Epistles to the Thessalonians; in Peter; in the Apocalypse, as to preclude all possibility of doubt; and yet we may doubt whether half the educated Christians fully believe in His second appearing.

A period of universal righteousness and peace at some future time, is, with equal explicitness, foretold by Isaiah and other sacred writers, when "the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den."

There seems to be a general unwillingness on the part of Christian teachers, to give much attention to these interesting subjects. Many have, in former times, made their observations and applied their predictions, in many cases, to the occurrences of their own times; and their failures have caused others, as may be presumed, at this day, to be over-cautious. We are always disposed to give the important events of our own times an undue prominence in the providence of God, which has been one of the causes of former failures; and some too, deem it necessary, to look out for much more mysterious meanings than the great simplicity of God's word would seem to justify. Others, on the contrary, have been disposed to dwarf down to the compass of half a dozen years, those grand predictions, which the prophet extended, in vision, to the final consummation.

In the earlier days of the church, it was not only not desirable, but hardly possible for believers to comprehend the full import of the prophecies; but every day's developments now give us new and more intelligible clues to their full understanding; and I cannot doubt that it is our duty and our privilege to use our opportunities for elucidating the truth of God, so far as the light we have enables us to do it.

I suppose my view of the mode of the fulfillment of certain prophecies differs from those generally entertained. I do not, for instance, imagine that the denunciations against the scarlet beast, necessarily involve the individual members of any church; but are directed against the primary and prevalent cause of corruption. The saints were delivered into the hand of antichrist. Now it is not the saints who challenge the wrath of God, but antichrist himself. A very little change, therefore, will be needed to prepare the members of the Roman Catholic communion for acceptance as a true church, although the severest denunciations are proclaimed against the Spiritual Babylon.

CHAPTER III.

THE ANNOUNCEMENT OF MESSIAH.

IN what shall be said upon the subject now in hand, we propose to confine our observations entirely to the times of Daniel, and such other parts of Scripture as may tend to elucidate those times: and this, as a logical, not a theological argument.

And to the perfect understanding of this prophecy, we must begin with the fact, which appears very clear, although denied by some learned and eminent men, that in all cases, namely, of prophecy, in this book, Daniel puts a day for a year; although in speaking of things past, he may use the word "day" in its ordinary acceptance.

For this use of the word we are not without authority, outside of the prophecy itself. In Numbers, fourteenth chapter, and thirty-fourth verse, it is written, "After the number of the days, in which ye searched the land, even forty days, each day for a year, shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years." So in the prophecy of Ezekiel, in the sixth verse of the fourth chapter, "Thou shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Israel, forty days; I have appointed thee each day for a year."

The ninth chapter of Daniel contains a prophecy of the coming of our Savior. This chapter commences with a declaration, that Daniel had learned by study, that Jerusalem was to be desolated seventy years, as foretold by Jeremiah, in the eleventh and twelfth verses of the twenty-fifth chapter. He had learned that, at the time of this prophecy, the seventy years of Babylonian captivity, were nearly accomplished, and he betook himself to prayer and supplication. Daniel was taken with the first captives from Jerusalem; he had lived much of his time at Babylon, and had been honored by the kings, during all his stay there, nearly seventy years. At the close of his prayer, he receives an answer from Gabriel, but upon another subject matter altogether. The angel, or as he calls him, the man Gabriel, informs him, that seventy weeks are determined, to punish the transgression, to make an end of sins, to make reconciliation for iniquity, to bring in everlasting righteousness, to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most holy. In the next verse, he divides the period of seventy weeks, from the going forth of the commandment, to rebuild Jerusalem, to Messiah the Prince, into two parts; the first seven weeks, and the second sixty-two; in all sixty-nine; and subsequently fills out the complement, by declaring that he shall confirm the covenant with many, for one week, in all seventy weeks. Whatever may be the conclusion as to the true meaning and force of the word "day," it is quite incredible that all the momentous things foretold in the foregoing category, could have been performed in the narrow space of one year and a half.

The questions arising upon these few verses are numerous, and exceedingly important; and may, for the most part, be definitely and satisfactorily answered. But for our present purpose, we have to enquire only, as to the matter of time. How much time was indicated by "seventy weeks?"

Some have assumed that it comprehends merely four hundred and ninety days. Except the Jews, most men repudiate this limited construction, and affirm that "weeks" should be interpreted, weeks of years, that is to say, a day for a year, or seventy weeks of years; four hundred and ninety years. We need not go into the argument, inasmuch as all, or nearly all, Christians fully believe in this extended meaning of the phrase. Indeed, one of the strongest arguments for the divine mission of our Lord, drawn from the Old Testament prophecies, is based upon this very interpretation.

The "seven weeks" are the forty-nine years consumed in the rebuilding of Jerusalem. The "sixty-nine weeks," or four hundred and eighty-three years, to the commencement of the public ministry of our Lord, and the "one week," the seven years of that ministry. Assuming such to have been the true meaning of this part of Daniel's prophecy, the inference, if he was an honest man, is conclusive, that he uses, namely, the same "days" for "years" to convey the same or similar ideas, throughout his whole prophecy. And hence we deduce the very great importance of this part of his writings, at this late day, independent of its direct reference to and prevision of the coming of our Lord.

As the design of this argument is to ascertain, if possible, the duration of the several periods indicated by Daniel, by the phrase "a time, times and half a time," "1260," "1290," "1335" days, and also "2300" days, and similar expressions, and their commencement and probable termination, it is not proposed to examine those parts of the prophecy, which are presumed to have been accomplished, nor to recapitulate arguments used heretofore by commentators for or against our own views ; but leaving others to disagree, we shall fall back upon their authority in such things as seem to need no further elucidation.

In the ninth chapter Daniel uses the term "weeks" — "seventy weeks." In the seventh "times" — "time, times and the dividing of time." And in the twelfth "days" — "one thousand two hundred and ninety days." Some have inferred from this, that in the one case, he uses a day for a year, and in the other does not.

In order to make out the term of years in the ninth chapter, it is necessary first to resolve the weeks into days. "Seventy weeks" — that is to say, seventy times seven—490 days. And then to resolve them again into years: that is, a year for a day. In the twelfth chapter, the prophet has already resolved the time into days ; but these writers argue that, as he does not require us to go through both processes required in the ninth chapter—"days" here do not mean the same as in the other case.

We have no controversy on this matter, each must judge for himself; but it seems to be a distinction without a difference. If weeks resolved into days, means so many years as there are days, in the ninth chapter, the writer cannot discover any reason for changing the meaning of "days" in the twelfth, and Daniel can be relieved from the imputation of deception in no other way.

CHAPTER IV.

THE SUBJECTION OF THE SAINTS TO ANTICHRIST.

IN the seventh chapter, Daniel brings down his history, through the Roman empire, till the beginning of the Romish Heirarchy. The twenty-fourth verse is as follows: "The ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise; and another shall arise after them, and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings." For the proof that the "little horn," the same as this king, "diverse from the first," represents the Romish Heirarchy, or we should rather say, the usurpations of the See of Rome, we refer to those writers who have treated of this matter at large, for more than a hundred years past. The twenty-fifth verse says, "He shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they (the saints) shall be given into his hand until a time, times and the dividing of time." The identity of the Roman Pontiff, here delineated, cannot be mistaken. But passing over the evidence of this, of which the older books are full, our design is to show more clearly and satisfactorily the period designated by the phrase "time, times and the dividing of time;" when it commenced and when it will end.

Most of those commentators who adopt the opinion that the word "day" is used for a year, by Daniel, fix the commencement of that epoch, and it seems with unquestionable truth, when the Emperor Phocas constituted Boniface, Universal Bishop and supreme head of the Church. This was the year 607. Previous to that time, the Patriarchs of Constantinople had been seeking from the Roman emperors a confirmation of the same dignity to them. At that time Gregory, sometimes called Gregory the Great, was Bishop of Rome, and preceding him was Pelagius. The opinions of these two Roman prelates, immediately preceding the creation of a universal bishop, are very significant and not a little curious. We will first quote a paragraph from Archbishop Laud: "About this time broke out the ambition of John, Patriarch of Constantinople, affecting to be universal bishop. He was countenanced in this by Mauritius the emperor ; but sorely opposed by Pelagius and St. Gregory, insomuch that St. Gregory plainly says this pride of his shows that the times of antichrist were near. So as yet (and this was near upon the point of six hundred years after Christ), there was no universal bishop ; no one monarch over the militant church. But Mauritius being deposed and murdered by Phocas, Phocas conferred upon Boniface the Third that very honor, that two of his predecessors had declaimed against, as monstrous and blasphemous, if not antichristian. Where, by the way, either these two popes, Pelagius and St. Gregory, erred in this weighty business, about an universal bishop, over the whole church ; or, if they did not err, Boniface and the rest which, after him, took it upon them, were in their very predecessors' judgment, antichristian."

We will now take a quotation from the writings of each of them, Pelagius and Gregory.

Pelagius says : "Let John take notice of this himself, that unless he quickly correct his error, he shall be excommunicated by us. Do not you also attend to the name of universality, which he unlawfully usurps to himself. Let none of the patriarchs use so profane an appellation. You see, dear brethren, what it is that is coming upon us presently ; while such perverse beginnings break out, even among the sacerdotal order. For this is near to him, concerning whom it is thus written, 'He is king over all the children of pride.'"

St. Gregory says: "My companion of the sacerdotal order, John, endeavors to have the title of universal bishop. Let such a name of blasphemy be banished from the hearts of Christians. Now I say, with assurance, that whosoever calls himself the universal priest, or desires to be so called, he is the forerunner of antichrist, in his insolence. But because, as we now see, the end of the world is approaching, the enemy of mankind has appeared in his forerunner; that he may have those very priests his forerunners in this proud title, who ought to oppose him, by living well and humbly."

It is hardly possible to avoid the conclusion that this 1260 years commenced with the year 607, without doing violence to the known facts of history. Nevertheless, there have been eminent and acute-minded men, who refer the whole prophecy to the short period of Antiochus Epiphanes; and, consequently, give the words of the prophet their natural and common signification, using the word "day" here for a natural day. This is an easy mode of disposing of a great prophecy. But there can be no satisfactory solution of it upon such a theory. Others may satisfy themselves that God would communicate so grand and glorious a revelation, under such marvellous surroundings, affecting the interests of comparatively a few people, during three or half a dozen years. But we must insist that a priori, independent of all other considerations, we should hold the wonderful display of God's glory in his manifestation to Daniel inconsistent with such a theory, But besides this, throughout the whole prophecy, we find interwoven the most incontestable evidence, that it was intended to foreshadow coming events, down to the time when the judgment shall sit; and with no desire to controvert any preconceived notions, we may be permitted to notice what appears to be a very great inconsistency in those who hold this diminutive doctrine. They all admit that the seventy weeks mentioned in the ninth chapter cover a period of 490 years; that is to say, that the prophet there uses a day prophetically for a year. Now it seems like charging Daniel with intentional deception, if he, in speaking of a prophetic time in one vision, uses "days" for "years," and then in another vision, in the same series of prophecies, uses days in their common acceptation; and this view of the case becomes the more impressive, on the theory that the ninth chapter is but the first of a consecutive series of visions, all the others resulting therefrom, and all forming but one connected chain of prophecy, relating to the Christian dispensation, from the birth of Christ down to the time of his second appearance.

If, then, the commencement of this division of time shall prove to have been the date supposed, namely, when Boniface was decreed by Phocas to be the supreme head of the church; as that occurred in the year 607 (erroneously assumed by many authors to have been in 606) of the Christian era; and if our views be correct as to the length of time expressed by the phrase, "time, times and half a time;" then the saints shall be delivered out of the hand of the antichristian power in the year, or about the year of our Lord 1867. We may here observe, that we should not consider a variance or discrepancy of one or two years, in so long a lapse of time, as of any considerable importance. But from the time Boniface assumed his antichristian office and functions, the time of their continuance will be 1260 years. The closing verses of this seventh chapter, seem to announce the universal reign of righteousness on the earth—the commencement of the millennium. We are not to presume, however, for there is nothing to sustain the presumption, that this happy period will commence immediately after the fall of antichrist; for there are yet many important events, foretold, and to be accomplished before the fullness of that glorious dispensation shall be ushered in. "The kingdom and the greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, and all dominions shall obey and serve him."

CHAPTER V.

THE ANSWER OF PALMONI — TWENTY-FOUR HUNDRED YEARS.

IT will be observed that while the fact, that the saints shall be delivered into the hands of anti-christ is foretold in clear and perfectly intelligible terms, and its duration, the era of its commencement is not stated, nor does chapter seventh give any fact from which it may be discovered by any possible course of argument. But in the eighth chapter the prophet gives a clue by which nearly all the times mentioned by him may be ascertained. After a most wonderful development of future events, comprehending the twin delusions of Rome and Mahomet, all comprised in a few words, the prophet heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which had spoken, "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?" The answer is given in the briefest and apparently most intelligible terms: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." The term of 1260 years, as expressed in the preceding vision, in the seventh chapter, could give no insight into the date of its termination, inasmuch as the time when the saints of the Most High should be delivered into the hands of the antichristian power was not known. It was only foretold that they should remain subject to that grinding and withering despotism so long. This answer of "Palmoni," the wonderful numberer, is intended to give a clue to discover the termination of the other period, as the two incontestably end at the same time. Its conclusion was anxiously expected by Bible students, and with great plausibility, about the year 1747, as this would accomplish 2300 years from the date of Daniel's prophecy. But as no such events happened at or near that time, as might have reasonably been anticipated, they were greatly disappointed; as those have been who had fixed upon sundry later periods. So that at this time the best and most reliable commentators have generally settled down upon the conviction that, as Daniel has not given us any epoch from which the 2300 years is to be calculated, we must remain in ignorance, until the great things foretold by him shall have been accomplished. Now this conclusion seems to be in direct opposition to the Divine mind. A form of words delivered to us by the Omniscient, which we cannot understand, would appear to be unworthy of the Great Teacher. Besides, we are assured that all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for our instruction. Wherein, then, would be the instruction conveyed to us by such a form of words, which we could not understand? And more than this, and at the close of this prophecy of Daniel, we are assured that "none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand." And our Saviour, quoting from this very prophecy, exclaims, "Whoso readeth, let him understand." To me there seems no more logical conclusion than that God intended that we should understand this prophecy, from time to time, as it is fulfilled, and reasonably before, and has given us the means and the power so to understand it.

In all the other prophecies of Daniel relating to time, except in one parallel case, he has given the epoch, or a reference to some other epoch from which to reckon the event. The seventy weeks of years were to commence at the going forth of the commandment to rebuild Jerusalem. The 1260 years were to commence from the delivery of the saints into the power of antichrist; but nowhere does he specify any point of time, from which to date the beginning of the 2300 years. It seems, therefore, a necessary inference, that this term must begin at the date of the prophecy. This seems also to be the plain meaning of the language used, "How long shall be the vision?" "Unto" (or better "until") "two thousand and three hundred" (days) "years." From what time? Obviously from the date of the present speaking. Judging of the question, intrinsically, without reference to outside occurrences, no one could give it any other meaning.

This vision appeared to Daniel, according to Archbishop Usher, about the year 553 before Christ. Proceeding from that date, and 2300 years would have ended in the year 1747. But no event occurred in the ecclesiastical world, at or near that time which especially arrested the attention of men; and as it cannot be presumed that God would suggest to Daniel so grand a vision, without any adequate result, we are constrained to believe that there is some error in chronology which needs revision and correction. On inquiry, we learn that in this place the version of the Septuagint differs from the Hebrew text. There, the time to the end, in the answer given, is 2400 years; and in many points of difference, this version is considered by learned men quite as reliable as the other. If, then, we assume the correctness of the Septuagint reading, the period of 2400 years would have expired in the year 1847. As the last six chapters of this prophecy of Daniel relate exclusively to ecclesiastical and sacred matters, never mentioning mere secular concerns, except when closely connected with, or necessary to the explanation of the other, we must look to the religious world for an elucidation of this prophecy. The question presented was double, of which more will be said hereafter. The answer reached but one: "Then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." This answer refers to the Roman Hierarchy. We are thus led to inquire whether any event occurred about the year 1847, affecting the power of the Pope concurrent with the answer given in this portion of the prophecy.

About the close of 1846, a revolution took place at Rome. Resistance was made, and successfully made to the domination of the Roman Pontiff. His own people rose, almost unanimously, against him, and expelled him from the eternal city; so that, in 1848, he sought refuge and safety in the dominions of a neighboring power, making his residence at Gaeta, within the territories of the King of Naples. Had this revolution succeeded, as its authors designed it should, it would seem to have been a fulfillment of Daniel's prophecy to the letter. But the Pope was very soon taken under the patronage of France, and by the power of France returned to Rome, where he has been kept in power until the present time; thus effectually frustrating the designs of the people of Rome, by whose efforts he had been expelled from that city. This is certainly a very extraordinary condition of things; and, in reference to a subsequent vision of the prophet, we cannot give it too much importance. Just 2400 years after the prophecy; by the Romans themselves; by his own ecclesiastical subjects; by a people who, for more than 1200 years, had sustained and supported the temporal and spiritual power of the Pope, he was expelled and made an outcast from the imperial city. So far as they could do it, they had deposed the Pope, and utterly annihilated his antichristian existence.

Why, then, we inquire, was not his power absolutely broken, and the persecution of the saints forever ended? Because, and only because, the French army "withstood" the purpose and efforts of his own subjects. That army "withstood" the people of Rome, by restoring their banished Pope, and by supporting him there, in the seat of his power, against their will, from then to the present time, 1867. It would be strange, indeed, if such a prophecy as this should, at the moment of its fulfillment, be thwarted and frustrated thus by a foreign government, and nothing foreshadowing such a result appear in the prophecy.

CHAPTER VI.

CHRONOLOGICAL CORRECTIONS.

THE tenth chapter commences as follows: "In the third year of Cyrus king of Persia." This has been assumed by almost all biblical students, on the authority of Archbishop Usher, to have been in the year 534 before Christ; which has also been assumed, on like authority, to have been the time of the vision, that is, the third year of Cyrus, king of the consolidated kingdom of Persia. It becomes necessary here to break off the regular course of our argument, to correct two errors in this chronology.

It may be affirmed, with perfect confidence, that Daniel was not living at the time specified, 534 B. C. The last verse of the first chapter of this prophecy is in these words: "And Daniel continued even unto the first year of king Cyrus." The obvious meaning attached to this phrase is, that he died in that year. As it is presumed that Daniel himself did not write it, but his compiler, undoubtedly after his death, it would be absurd for him to say that he lived unto the first year if he knew that he lived to and after the third. It would be still more absurd to make this statement when, in the prophecy itself, a little further on, appeared the fact that he was alive two years later. This absurdity appears even more glaring when we examine the Septuagint reading. The word translated "continued" is in Greek egeneto, which might be better rendered "was alive," meaning very nearly, though not quite the same. But the word eōs, translated "unto," means more properly "until," which is somewhat inconsistent with the fact that he lived years thereafter.

The reader may here, very properly, inquire, What, then, is the meaning of the introductory paragraph before quoted? We will endeavor to make it plain to the perception of every one.

The introduction to the eighth chapter is as follows: "In the third year of the reign of king Belshazzar." This seems to have been universally assumed, and appears always to be noted in Bible references as the year 553 B. C. Some authorities (Mr. Hales among them), however, place the beginning of Belshazzar's reign in the year 558 B. C., while Calmet fixes it in 555. In either case, it is impossible that the third year of his reign should fall upon any portion of the year 553. The larger portion would fall within the year 555 or 552; but making allowance for the difference between the Jewish calendar and our own, a considerable part might fall within the year 554, which we assume, for our present purpose, to be the correct reading.

Let us now pass over to Cyrus. According to the commonly received opinion, he began his reign in Persia, 559 B. C. (or according to Calmet, 554); over Media 551, and over his consolidated empire of Persia, Media and Babylon, in 536.

It is generally assumed that he commenced his reign over Persia proper in 559. Almost all writers rely upon the authority of Xenophon. But however reliable Xenophon may be in other matters, his account seems, in this particular, very uncertain. According to Rollin, who takes Xenophon for his authority throughout, "the years of Cyrus' reign are computed differently. Some make it thirty years, beginning from his first setting out from Persia, at the head of an army, to succor his uncle Cyaxeres; others make it to be but seven years, because they date it only from the time when, by the death of Cyaxeres and Cambyses, he became sole monarch of the whole empire." Indeed, relying upon the account of that historian alone, it would be difficult to fix upon any date.

Upon this point Herodotus appears to be much more clear, intelligible and reliable. His account is as follows: "He (Cyrus) next attacked and took Sardis, and made Crœsus prisoner (B. C. 546). He besieged and took the City of Babylon, B. C. 538, which he entered by diverting the course of the Euphrates, and leading his army into the city by the dry bed of the river. At last he carried his arms against the Massagetae, and was defeated and slain by Tomyris, their queen, B. C. 529. who had his head cut off and put into a leathern bag full of human blood." "He had reigned twenty-nine years." If, then, you add the 29 years of his reign to 529, the year before Christ in which he was killed, it shows that he commenced his reign in the year 558.

Such being the case, it will be seen that the third year of Cyrus, as well as the third of Belshazzar (making allowance for the difference between the Jewish calendar and our own), might fall partly on the five hundred and fifty-fourth year B. C.

Let us now return to the prophecy of Daniel. "In the third year of Cyrus king of Persia." Was this the year 534 B. C.? We cannot so understand it. In the eighth chapter he had recorded a vision which appeared to him "in the third year of king Belshazzar." In the tenth chapter he is about to narrate another vision, but relating to the same subject, and supplementary thereto. He then, in this first verse, refers to the former vision, viz: "In the third year of Cyrus king of Persia." Here, apparently, may seem to be a discrepancy, but one easily explained. Daniel's residence was at Babylon. In those days, the epoch of almost all time was the commencement of the reign of the existing sovereign. If, therefore, Daniel was at the court of Babylon, it would be correct, and most natural that, in writing an account of his vision, he should use the epoch of the Babylonians, which was the beginning of Belshazzar's reign; and, when, afterwards, being at the court of Cyrus, and having occasion to refer to the same event, it was equally natural and proper that he should use the epoch of the Persians, which was the reign of Cyrus. His vision, therefore, as related in the eighth chapter, is correctly stated to have occurred "in the third year of king Belshazzar;" and the same vision is, with like propriety, stated in the tenth chapter, to have occurred "in the third year of Cyrus king of Persia," when referred to at a subsequent period, he then being at the court of Cyrus. This view of the case seems to be fully confirmed by the fact, that, a little further on, in the first verse of the eleventh chapter, and in the same vision, Daniel refers to a former vision, by the use of similar phraseology, "Also I, in the first year of Darius the Mede," in which there seems to be no room for doubt that he refers to the vision related in the ninth chapter, and not to that which he was about to record. The greater importance of these seemingly frivolous changes in the received chronology, will appear in subsequent chapters.

CHAPTER VII.

ADDITION OF 21 TO THE 2400 YEARS.

IN the tenth chapter of Daniel we have the record of a vision, the significance of which seems to have been strangely overlooked by commentators, and sometimes as strangely misunderstood; for while, in all the preceding visions, they have interpreted prophetic days to mean natural years, here, in a continuation of the same prophecy, they almost, if not entirely, without exception, have given that time its natural and not prophetic meaning; and thus confining the whole purport of one of these grand visions of Daniel to the insignificant space of three natural weeks, and in which trifling space of time some unknown barbarian is the chief actor.

As we before proved, Daniel commences this chapter with a reference to the former vision, and adds, "The thing was true, but the time was long."

Now, either or all these propositions, taken separately and independently, mean nothing.

First, He affirms that a "thing" was revealed to him in the third year of Cyrus. This adds nothing to what had appeared before.

Second, He affirms that "the thing," or, better, "prophecy was true." As an abstract proposition this would seem quite unnecessary; for if any one doubted his former record, this new asseveration would scarce remove the doubt. And,

Third, "The time appointed was long." It would certainly need no prophet to convince the most skeptical that 2300 or 2400 years was a long time, and such a gratuitous affirmation of it would be deemed quite absurd.

This statement in the first verse is evidently an introduction to what he is about to relate, and is thus presented, that this vision may be the better understood. He first states that he had a revelation in the third year of Cyrus, of which he had made a record. He then affirms that this former revelation was true, in all essential particulars; but he had probably learned that in some non-essentials, or in its full import, it might be misapprehended. He then follows up this statement with the further and important part of the preface, namely, "But the time appointed was long," thus showing very clearly that whatever of his former revelation might seem incorrect, or liable to misconception, related to time. It would seem that the whole passage would be rendered perfectly intelligible, if the last word could, consistently with the idiom of the Hebrew language, be rendered in the comparative degree, so as to read, "The revelation was true, but the time was longer." Not, however, being acquainted with the Hebrew, and knowing no authority for such a change, we adopt the English reading as it is, simply implying that whatever correction is to be made, relates to time.

"In those days I Daniel was mourning three full weeks." It is not necessary, for any purpose connected with our theory, to affirm that he mourned full twenty-one years, because he is not now prophecying, but merely relating a current event; and yet it would seem to imply some inconsistency in him to use the same terms with a different meaning, even in the recital of a fact. The only significance belonging to it, however, arises out of the circumstance, that the time precisely coincides with that of the subsequent prophecy, as will appear.

In the prophetical portion of this chapter there is but one revelation of the slightest importance communicated ; and singularly enough that revelation appears to have been passed over with little reflection, and with no apparent effort to give it any significance, or to reconcile any supposed discrepancy in the former vision. Now, bearing in mind our view of the intent of the prefatory verse of the chapter, let us try to fathom the purport of this hitherto obscure passage. Daniel saw a man clothed in linen, who spoke encouragingly to him : "Then said he unto me, Fear not Daniel ; for from the first day that thou didst set thine heart to understand, and to chasten thyself before thy God, thy words were heard, and I am come for thy words. But the prince of the kingdom of Persia, withstood me one and twenty days." For some reason, which it is not necessary for us to know, or wise to inquire into, the vision related in the eighth chapter only reached to the first great blow aimed at the Romish Hierarchy, although in the seventh chapter he had very explicitly stated that "they shall take away his dominion to consume and to destroy it unto the end." This phrase, "consume unto the end," necessarily implies a slow process of waste or decomposition. To waste slowly is a just meaning of consume. In this sense it is used in other places in the Scriptures. Job says, "My flesh is consumed away." So Zechariah :

“Their flesh, their eyes, their tongue, shall consume away;” and in the Psalms, “The wicked shall perish, they shall consume.” In these, and other instances, it is obvious that “consume” does not imply instantaneous destruction, but protracted dissolution. Now, the revelation in this tenth chapter was designed to inform Daniel that the first blow which would be struck in 2400 years, would not be fatal, but only a prelude to the final catastrophe, as it must “consume and destroy unto the end;” that through the interposition of a foreign power, after this first blow, the power of antichrist would be partially restored; and thus to advise him that the facts of coming history, as disclosed to him in the prophecy, would be all true in their fulfillment; yet that the time required for the entire destruction of the power of antichrist would be longer, by twenty-one years, than that before mentioned; during which it would consume and be destroyed. Now, compare this prophecy as presented, with the actual state of things in Rome, as exhibited in the fourth chapter of this argument. Near the close of 1846, or beginning of 1847, exactly 2400 years from the date of Daniel’s prophecy in the eighth chapter, a rebellion broke out in the states of the church, in consequence of which, the Pope abdicated and fled beyond the frontier of his own dominions. By the favor of a foreign prince he, a fugitive, found an asylum at Gaeta; and from that time to this (1867) he has had no existence, as sovereign pontiff, but such as he has derived from the intervention of France. The decree for the destruction of antichrist had gone forth, but precisely in accordance with the prophetic announcement, the utter and final extinction of his antichristian power was postponed one-and-twenty years, during which he and his power were to consume and be destroyed.

Let us now recapitulate. The saints were delivered into the hands of the papal antichrist, in the year 607, by the decree of Phocas. They are to remain subject to his power, "a time, times, and the dividing of time," 1260 years, or until the year 1867. The "wonderful numberer," in reply to a complex question, answers only to that part of it relating to the continuance of the antichristian power; that it should continue until the expiration of 2400 years, which would end, beginning as we have before shown it ought to begin, at the year 554 before Christ, in the year 1846 of the Christian era; and now in the tenth chapter, Daniel is again informed that the perfect accomplishment of this vision will be "withstood" by the king of Persia, (that is, by France, as we shall show,) for a period of twenty-one years; which being added to the former term of 2400, brings us down to the year 1867; and thus these two predictions are made with sufficient exactness to synchronize, which all commentators agree should be the case.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE SYMBOL OF THE RAM WITH HORNS.

WE now approach the scrutiny of that problem, which appears to be the most inexplicable of the whole prophecy, namely, that the power interposing in behalf of the Pope, was rightfully France, and not Persia, as would seem prima-facie from the text of Daniel to have been necessary. Upon this point we give our view of the case; and so leave each one to judge whether it be worthy of further consideration.

We are too much prone, in construing prophecy, to take the literal meaning, rather than seek the truth which is often veiled under symbolical expressions. As an instance, let us quote that one which is relied upon more confidently as a literal fulfillment, than any other, Alexander, namely, as the rough goat in the eighth chapter; and Media and Persia, as the ram. We object to this first, for the reason, that if it be so, Daniel's vision is history and not prophecy ; the history being a little antedated. Second, we cannot discover the exact parallelism between the prophecy and the supposed fulfillment, in the case of Alexander. Third, it leaves a chasm between the ram and the fifth horn of the goat of near a thousand years ; while it seems quite certain that they should be nearly, or quite cotemporaneous. And fourth, it is hardly consistent with the scope of the prophecy, that so much should be devoted to matters involving only the secular interests of nations of barbarians.

In the time of Daniel, Persia was, relatively, a powerful kingdom, and so continued for more than two hundred years ; but from the year 330 B. C., or thereabouts, until the present time, with the exception of a short but most important period, of which more will be said hereafter, it has been perfectly insignificant, and for many years hardly known in its influence upon the Christian world. If, then, the view taken in this argument of the 2400 years be correct, and that it could not expire, with the twenty-one years added, until the present time, it seems incredible that Persia should be literally intended in the paragraph under discussion. And it should be also borne in mind that Daniel is here prophesying and not relating history. It must be presumed, therefore, that he employs prophetic language, which though sometimes used in its literal sense, is most commonly couched in terms not so easily comprehended. It is often, if not always, the design so to express the meaning that it will prove true, but not immediately be understood. And again, so dark and inexplicable have seemed these references to the prince of the kingdom of Persia, that respectable commentators have advanced a great deal about tutelary and guardian angels presiding over different countries; as if they strove, one against the other, each for his favorite state; which must be deemed very inconsistent with the principles of Christianity, and indeed more befitting a system of Paganism; and merely shows to what shifts good men are sometimes driven, to evade an acknowledged difficulty.

The explication herein given may appear quite as absurd, especially as in a most essential point it directly contravenes the theory heretofore generally adopted by expositors.

We learn from those competent to instruct, that the original name of "Persia," and which comprehended all Media, is derived from the same root, in the Hebrew, as the word "ram;" and that the difference between them is very minute. In reference to the peculiar genius of the Hebrew language, we quote from Parkhurst's Preface to the Hebrew Lexicon: "It will be demonstratively evident to any one, who will attentively examine the subject, that the Hebrew language is 'ideal;' or that from a certain and that no great number of primitive and apparently arbitrary words, called roots, and usually expressive of some idea or notion taken from nature, that is, from the external objects around us, or from our own constitution by our senses or feelings, all the other words of that tongue are derived or grammatically formed; and that wherever the radical letters are the same, the leading idea or notion runs through all the deflections of the word, however numerous or diversified."

The whole country then known as that of the Elamites, or Persia, bore a name in Hebrew almost identically the same with "ram." Mr. Meade, in his third book, conjectures that the Hebrew word for "ram," and that for "Persia," both springing from the same root, and both implying somewhat of strength, the one is not improperly made the type of the other. His use of that fact, however, differs much from ours. We assume, then, that in this and other instances, the prophet used the term "Persia" typically, and in such a manner as to express the true meaning on his part; at the same time preserving the mystic sense so common and necessary in all the prophecies. Hence is drawn the conclusion, that "the ram with horns" was not literally the kingdom of Media and Persia, but in fact the Roman Hierarchy. And if the explanation had not been given in the latter part of the chapter (ambiguous as it seems to be), few would have entertained a doubt of this application. And here we observe that the "ram" is not usually represented as having two horns. By reference to our English version, it will appear that before the seventh verse, wherever "two" is used, no such word is found in the original, nor is it found in the Septuagint. In the third verse one horn is represented higher than "the other," which might with equal propriety be rendered "than another;" and in the seventh verse, where we are informed that the goat broke his horns, it is not as translated, "two horns," but "both horns." It would seem, therefore, that ambiguity was purposely adopted. In one, and the most obvious aspect, the Hierarchy had two, and but two, horns. But in another aspect, certainly not less important, he had more than two, varying in number, from time to time, so that it would be impossible to fix upon any number, at any one time, as applicable to the whole period. His "two" horns were his temporal power on the one side, and his ecclesiastical despotism on the other. The ecclesiastical was certainly higher than the secular; and in the most obvious sense, these were represented as two horns. On the other hand, when the power of the transgressors had come to the full, the Hierarchy stretched its ecclesiastical domination over all the countries of Europe, and wherever the Roman Catholic religion prevailed. During a large portion of this 1260 years, there was no single secular despotism in Europe so absolute within its own dominions as the Pope over them all. In this view of the case, every kingdom thus situated was most emphatically a horn of the Hierarchy. And so while it was perfectly correct to describe it as having two horns in the one case, it was equally correct to describe it as the ram with horns; that is, an indefinite number of horns, in the other case.

It will appear, by and by, in treating of the downfall of Mahometanism, how exceedingly appropriate is the he-goat, as an emblem of that power. Scarcely less appropriate is the selection of the "ram," as a type of the Roman pontiff, or rather of Romanism as an ecclesiastical system.

In speaking of his followers, Christ describes them as his "fold," his "sheep;" and of those who are not, as "goats." The term sheep, then, in an enlarged sense, would comprise all nominally Christian countries; while "goats" would comprehend all others. But while sheep are distinguished by their quiet and peaceful habits, there is no more choleric and bellicose animal than the "ram;" and from all these premises, we conclude that the ram described in the first part of chapter eight refers to the Roman hierarchy, and that the word "Persia," is used typically for the "ram," in the passage now under consideration; namely, the thirteenth verse of the tenth chapter.

It will be observed that the power that "withstood" the angel, is not the "king of Persia," but "the prince of the kingdom of the Persians," Archōn basileias Persōn. The proper meaning of archōn is chief, or principal. Let us apply this to the case in hand. The angel was sent to destroy anti-christ, the Roman hierarchy. But "the chief of the kingdom of the ram" "withstood" him twenty-one years. The question now arises, who was the chief of the kingdom of the ram? or the principal horn of the ecclesiastical power of the Roman hierarchy? Beyond all controversy, twenty years ago, and until now, France was the "chief" of this kingdom. France then was truly the "prince of the kingdom of the ram," which, according to the prophecy, should "withstand" the angel twenty-one years; and this is precisely the time that France has withstood the will of the Roman people, and, we may add, the desire of almost all Christendom, to consume and destroy the power of the Hierarchy. We may then conclude from this analysis and comparison of all these premises, prophetic and secular, that the 1,260 years, for which the saints were delivered into the power of anti-christ, will end in the present year 1867.

NOTE TO CHAPTER VIII.

To any one who shall peruse this treatise, it will be obvious that the whole argument is hinged upon the existence of a single fact; namely, that the saints were delivered into the hands of the little horn—that is, the Roman church—for a time, times and the dividing of time (Dan. vii. 28), in the year 607, and that that period expired in 1867. And the writer freely admits that if this proposition is not substantially true, his whole argument falls to the ground.

Much the largest portion of it was written before 1867; and the whole was completed, in almost precisely its present form (excepting the 10th chapter), before the end of the month of February of that year.

Imperative circumstances have postponed its publication until now ; and the question becomes all-important, Has the event anticipated, and upon which the whole value of the argument depends, been accomplished ? That is to say, did the period of 1260 years end in 1867, or, substantially, as it was supposed it would ?

That an extended duration, affecting millions of persons, scattered over half the globe, should commence and be perfected in all its fullness, among all these millions, in a single day or a single year ; or that the power of antichrist should subject them all to his dominion in a single year, seems not only improbable but impossible. The subjection of the whole Christian world to one controlling and persecuting power, must be a work of time ; and we may well assume, if it were yet to occur, that it would proceed from small beginnings, and so by constant and persevering encroachments, finally attain its zenith of despotic dominion ; and then, after an interval, gradually decline and finally perish.

From the introduction of Christianity, for about 400 years, pagan persecution was endured almost universally. After that there was a period of comparative peace and quietness. It was at this time that the Bishop of Rome began to claim superiority over other prelates. But it was by slow degrees that his pretensions secured obedience.

The fact that the Bishops of Rome, Antioch and Alexandria, presided over primitive and apostolic churches, gave to them a kind of pre-eminence over others, even as early as the fourth century. "About the close of that century, the Bishop of Rome surpassed all his brethren in the magnificence and splendor of the church over which he presided; in the riches of his revenue and possessions; in the number and variety of his ministers; in his credit with the people, and in his sumptuous and splendid manner of living."

"In the fifth century a variety of circumstances united in augmenting the power and authority of the Bishop of Rome; though he had not as yet assumed or claimed the dignity of supreme law-giver and judge of the whole Christian church."

"Although the Roman Pontiffs artfully availed themselves of every circumstance that could contribute to their obtaining universal dominion, yet it is certain that towards the close of the sixth century the emperors, and the nations in general, were far from being willing to bear with patience the yoke of servitude which the See of Rome was arrogantly imposing upon the Christian church."

Now, assuming the Roman Pontiff to be the power into whose hands the saints were to be delivered, it will appear very certain from the extracts above given, that that consummation had not yet arrived; although he had made great strides towards attaining the desired end. For two hundred years the successive occupants of the See of Rome had constantly been making encroachments upon the liberty of the Christian church; and—as the “little horn”—had undoubtedly secured a very large despotic power; but it is quite evident that something more was necessary to make the “delivery” of the saints into the power of the hierarchy complete.

It was in this condition of affairs, that in 607 Phocas constituted Boniface III. universal Bishop, thus investing him with a new, abnormal, temporal authority; and this was the commencement of the absolute Papal supremacy—the 1260 years, as has been shown in Chapter IV. of this treatise.

At this point we step aside from the general scope of our argument, to note what appears like a discrepancy in the view of some who have commented upon Daniel and St. John.

It is generally admitted that the power of the Roman church is symbolized in Daniel by the “little horn” rising up among the ten. It is also held that the same church is symbolized in the Revelation of St. John, by “another beast coming up out of the earth, having two horns like a lamb.”

Is not the apparent discrepancy reconciled in this manner?

The power and influence of the Bishop of Rome had been gradually and constantly growing in Italy, during two hundred years, until it had become altogether the most potent ecclesiastical dominion on earth, overriding some of the secular governments of Italy. It might, then, with great propriety, be described as a "little horn."

In 607, Phocas, by his decree, constituted this same Bishop of Rome supreme head of the church, not in Italy only, but over all the Christian world. It will be observed that this dignity so conferred, while it left the Bishop of Rome in possession of all his usurped authority—by the change in the character of his jurisdiction, and by investing him with a vast quasi temporal power—effected an entire revolution in the nature and condition of his government. While he was before only Bishop of Rome, he is now Supreme and Universal Pontiff. From this time the simple symbol of a "little horn," would not fairly represent the Bishop in his double sovereign capacity; but "the beast coming up out of the earth having horns like a lamb," would most admirably symbolize the same Bishop invested with his new power and pontifical robes, just emerging into supreme sovereignty.

Before, he only exercised the dominion usurped by an ambitious prelate ; now, he reigns clothed with (what would in those times have been considered) the legitimate authority of a temporal as well as spiritual potentate.

From this time the power of that government, ecclesiastical and temporal, continued to increase, until it had grasped and absorbed nearly the entire sovereignty in all the nations of the civilized world. For centuries every potentate in Europe trembled at the rebuke of the Pope, and his "emissaries and abettors in the persons of priests, monks, and Jesuits were spread over all the world as frogs were in the houses, the bed-chambers, the ovens and the kneading-troughs of the Egyptians." In fact, there was no sovereign in Europe who could wield half the power in his own dominions, as the hierarchy over them all : and during all this long, dark period, no one dared to utter a sentiment not in accordance with the teachings of Rome ; and no one could do it without subjecting himself to all the pains and penalties which a cruel and relentless despotism could inflict. Ignorance, superstition, credulity and persecution, for ages preserved this empire over the consciences, the persons, the property, and the liberties of mankind.

It is now near 400 years since this stupendous fabric of power on the one side, and delusion on the other, began to crumble and fall away, but no era has marked its utter overthrow until the present time.

Before the year 1867 nearly all Europe had become emancipated from the thralldom of Rome, except Spain and Austria; and now the one, by voluntary action, and the other, by a violent revolution, have shaken themselves free from the yoke of bondage, it may be presumed forever, leaving really no more power in the hierarchy than the Bishop of Rome possessed before the decree of Phocas.

The period of 1260 years seems to have closed up in a most signal and remarkable manner, so as to leave no shred of doubt that this is truly the period referred to by the prophet.

The whole sum of 1260 years has been divided into three portions of almost equal length. From the date of the decree of Phocas, it was 400 years, or very near that, before the hierarchy became, by gradual usurpations, almost omnipotent over the conscience and person. For the 400 or 500 succeeding years, that power was supreme over all the Christian world, and now for 400 years it has been, as gradually as it arose, crumbling away, until at the very date anticipated, the last hold of persecution has surrendered.

The bull of the Pope calling an Œcumenical Council to be held in 1869, is itself abundant proof of the utter subversion of the persecuting power (however the will may remain) of the Hierarchy.

At the time the preceding chapter was written, it was supposed the 1260 years would have closed up with the end of the year 1867, while the final consummation did not occur until some months later.

In relation to this apparent discrepancy, it may be remarked that had no correction of the common chronology been made, but that of our Bibles been adopted, the 2421 years would have ended with the year 1868. And, while the decree of Phocas was granted in 607, Boniface himself, being in a feeble condition, died before the close of that year; so that, in fact, the execution of the decree could not have been begun before 608: and, indeed, his successor was not appointed until that year.

But putting aside this explanation, it is a sufficient answer, that in periods of time so long as 2421, and 1260 years, the variation of half or two-thirds of a year is remarkable only for its so exact correspondence with the anticipated event. Here, with more than its usual force, may we quote the maxim of law, "De minimis non curat lex."

POSTSCRIPT, JANUARY, 1871.

Since the above note was written, new and extraordinary developments have appeared, which seem to require a further notice.

According to my argument, the 2,421 years closed up in 1868, as the only nations which had continued to submit to the papal authority then freed themselves from the yoke of ecclesiastical despotism. The Roman Pontiff thus divested of his supremacy, retained in Rome no more or larger power than, as the "little horn," he possessed before the decree of Phocas, thus fulfilling the terms of the prophecy.

During the year 1870, two events have occurred calculated to deeply enlist the public interest—the one, the withdrawal of the French troops from Rome; the other, the occupation of Rome by the Italian government. As the last was a necessary result of the preceding occurrences, it needs no comment. But that the French army remained within the walls of Rome, avowedly to protect the Pope from overthrow, precisely twenty-one years, is certainly a fact worthy of notice, when taken in connection with my argument written more than three years before the close of that term. But it is also noticeable that the twenty-one years of the possession of Rome by the French army, was not coeval with the twenty-one years added in my argument to the 2400, as it commenced and ended two years later, or a little more. Whether this is a true variation, and the prophecy was intended to meet both contingencies, or whether the discrepancy may be removed by further study, is not certain. But when we consider the difficulties of ancient chronology, we may well presume that so small a disagreement will ultimately be cleared up and disappear. And even now, so far as the 2421 years are concerned, the whole variation would vanish by adopting the chronology of Calmet, who fixes the beginning of Belshazzar's reign at 555 B. C., and that of Cyrus at 554, or a little earlier. Adopting this as our starting point, and the 2421 years would end in 1870.

As yet, however, I am not prepared to change my former position in this respect.

CHAPTER IX.

THE SYMBOL OF THE HE-GOAT.

BUT it is quite apparent, as has been before remarked, that the question put by the saint comprises much more than was answered by "Palmoni," "the wonderful numberer." Let us put the questions into their proper form :

"How long shall be the vision,

First, Concerning the daily sacrifice, and

Second, Concerning the transgression of desolation, to give both,

First, The sanctuary, and

Second, The host,

to be trodden under foot?"

The answer is intended, most clearly, to meet but one of these inquiries, "Unto two thousand and four hundred (days) years. Then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." If my former exposition be correct, this answer refers only and exclusively to anti-christian Rome.

We are now prepared to pursue our investigations to elucidate the other part of this doubly duplicated question. "How long shall be the vision concerning the transgression of desolation, to give the host to be trodden under foot?" Having disposed of the "ram," we now proceed to investigate the typical meaning of the "he-goat."

We may assume, and it is so affirmed in the eighth chapter, that the time of this he-goat was cotemporaneous with the commencement of the power of the "ram." In the year of our Lord 590, Chosroes II. ascended the throne of Persia. He became a very powerful sovereign and unscrupulous in all his movements. He carried his arms into Judea, Libya and Egypt. He was equally successful in his wars against the Roman Emperors. In A. D. 611, his army conquered nearly all Greece. He laid all Palestine waste, took the city of Jerusalem; and "here the Persians committed such outrageous acts, as the horror of them is not to be expressed. They sold 90,000 Christians to the Jews, who did not buy them with an intent to use them as the universal consent of nations requires captives should be used, but, inventing unheard of torments, put them to cruel death," and "not content with their devastations in Asia, they rolled on like an irresistible stream, and overwhelmed Egypt, pillaging Alexandria." His army carried their conquest to the very gates of Constantinople, plundering, murdering, and committing every species of violence upon the unhappy inhabitants until nothing but the Bosphorus saved that city from ruin. "These violent irruptions of the Persians, in which they scattered destruction all around, roused up the Emperor, and made him think of some method to obstruct or prevent them. He once more sent his ambassadors to Chosroes who, in most earnest terms, represented to him how highly he was engaged to the empire, and entreated him to accept of a peace, upon whatever conditions he should think fit himself. But the barbarian grew more insolent, from his submission, and affronted not only the emperor and empire, but blasphemed God himself, for he arrogantly replied that he would give ear to no terms of accommodation, till he (Heraclius and his people) had solemnly renounced their crucified Savior, and publicly adored the sun, the great god of the Persians." This was in the year 618. From this time the destinies of war changed; and although Chosroes raised many armies, which fought many battles and made some conquests, yet the Emperor Heraclius was most commonly successful, until, finally, he drove Chosroes a fugitive from his palace, which was pillaged and burnt by the Roman soldiers; and now his eldest son seized the sovereignty, stopped Chosroes in his flight, caused eighteen of his sons to be massacred before his face, threw him into a dungeon, where every indignity was heaped upon him which malice could devise; and, after five days, death put an end to his sufferings, which happened in the year of our Lord 628: and very soon the Persian Empire was broken up, and afterwards subjected to the Arabian Caliphs.

This history of Chosroes is but an enlarged account of the he-goat: "And as I was considering, behold a he-goat came from the west, on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground; and the goat had a notable horn between his eyes; and he came to the ram that had horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and ran unto him in the fury of his power, and I saw him come close unto the ram, and he was moved with choler against him, and smote the ram, and broke his two horns, and there was no power in the ram to stand before him, but he cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him, and there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand. Therefore the he-goat waxed very great ; and when he was strong the great horn was broken, and for it came up four notable ones, towards the four winds of heaven." There does seem here to be an inconsistency. The he-goat is said to come from the west ; while, in respect to the Christian portion of the world, Chosroes came from the east. The word here translated "west," is in the Septuagint Libos, preceded by the preposition "apo," usually translated "from." Nevertheless it sometimes means "against," or "athwart," either of which would remove all difficulty.

The Greek word "Lips," "Libos," is both a common noun, and a proper name. In this place we shall examine it only as a common noun.

As such, it may undoubtedly, be correctly translated "south-west" as a point of the compass ; it is so translated in the twelfth verse of the twenty-seventh chapter of the Acts.

The word "Lips" with combinations represents every point of the compass between the south and the west ; but neither the south nor west. It may be here remarked that Alexander did not go from the west towards Persia, but from the north-west, and if you give "Lips" its true meaning, the point would be nearly at right angles to the route from Macedonia to Persia.

Another meaning of "Lips" as a common noun is, Latin, Petra; English, "a place full of rocks or stones."

How truly this would represent Persia may be seen by a quotation from a modern geography. "The distinguishing features of this country are a deficiency of rivers, and a multitude of mountains; its plains, where they occur, are generally desert." "The mountains of this country, which are for the most part rocky, without wood or plants, are interspersed with valleys, some of which are stony and sandy." Another writer says, "The most remarkable features of Persia are its chains of rocky mountains; its long, arid, riverless valleys, and the still more extensive salt or sandy deserts. There is a magnificent range, which, striking off from the Caucasus, accompanies the course of the Georgian river Kour, crosses it to the west of the plains of Mogan, covers Karabaug and Karadaug with a gloomy assemblage of black peaks. These are the principal stocks, from whence arise the multitude of ramifications, that cover the surface of Persia with a net-work, as it were, of rocky lines," Another says, "It (Persia) has been termed a country of mountains; and a large portion of it is certainly mountainous." "The aspect of the Persian mountains is peculiarly bare and forbidding, rising abruptly from the plain, and presenting nothing to the eye but large masses of gray rocks, piled upon each other."

Chardin says, speaking of the desert of Carmania: "At some distance from the coast the ground rises, and the interior of the country, towards the north, is intersected by numerous mountain ranges. The soil upon these mountains is very dry and barren; and though there are some fertile valleys among them, they are generally fit only for the residence of nomadic shepherds. This part of Persia was the original seat of the conquerors of Asia, where they were inured to hardship and privation."

There is, perhaps, no other country in the world, so large in extent, which so exactly answers to "a country full of rocks."

This he-goat, we are informed, is the "king of Grecia." From this passage all writers, for twenty centuries, have jumped to the conclusion that Alexander, namely, was symbolized by "the he-goat," assuming that he was "king of Grecia." To this we demur; for Alexander was no more king of Grecia than Chosroes—nay, he had not so good a claim to the title. Alexander was king of Macedonia; and whatever may be the modern divisions, in early times Macedonia was not Greece nor a part of Greece. So late as the time of the apostles, we are told "Paul called unto him the disciples, and embraced them, and departed for to go into Macedonia. And when he had gone over those parts, and had given them much exhortation, he came into Greece." Thus clearly showing that, at that time, Macedonia and Greece were recognized as distinct countries. And more than this, Alexander himself never even claimed to be the king of Greece. Rollin says: "He (Alexander) summoned at Corinth the assembly of the several states and free cities of Greece, to obtain from them the same supreme command against the Persians as had been granted his father, a little before his death. The deliberations of the assembly were very short; and that prince was unanimously appointed generalissimo against the Persians."

To a superficial observer, this explanation of the he-goat, namely, that he was king of Grecia, given by the angel, would seem to set at rest the claim that Chosroes was identical with the he-goat. But when we consider that, for a long time, Chosroes' empire comprised nearly all Greece proper, although a Persian prince, it does not seem so strange that he should be called "king of Grecia." And then when we remember that this word Grecia, in scripture, often comprehends all the countries inhabited by the descendants of Javan, and, further, that "after the time of Alexander the Great, when the Greeks became masters of Egypt, Syria and the countries beyond the Euphrates, the Jews included all gentiles under the name of Greeks," it would appear to have been unexceptionably appropriate to speak of Chosroes as the "king of Grecia;" far more so than Alexander.

Assuming the he-goat to be emblematical of Chosroes, and the "little horn which waxed exceeding great" his Mahometan successors, the type appears to have been selected with unequalled propriety. The words translated "he-goat," are "o tragos aigōn;" a he-goat not only, but, literally, "a he-goat of the she-goats." In the kingdom of Persia, in the time of Chosroes, polygamy prevailed, he himself having a seraglio of numerous wives; and the same custom, under the sway of Mahometanism, prevails until the present time. The he-goat is often used, even till this day, as an emblem of all that is lascivious and wanton; and when described, as in this phrase, as "a he-goat of the she-goats," it would seem impossible to avoid the conclusion that its reference is to Chosroes and his Turkish and Mahometan successors, with their polygamous harems.

CHAPTER X.

SOMEWHAT MORE OF THE RAM AND HE-GOAT.

AS this question—Who were symbolized by the he-goat with one horn; and the ram with horns?—is one of the fundamental problems of the prophecy of Daniel; and as, for thousands of years, no one seems to have entertained a doubt that Alexander was the he-goat and Persia the ram, it will doubtless be deemed by all a bold, and by many an irreverent, assault upon fixed facts of prophecy and history to aim at any change in the world-wide belief so long and so firmly held. But is it not possible that one grand error in this crucial point has heretofore obscured the prophecy of Daniel, with that impenetrable veil which all students have been anxious to remove, and which has been the cause of so many disappointments?

What appeared applicable, in the course of the argument, has been already written. Something further may tend to strengthen our hypothesis.

The Greek word "Lips" is both a common noun and a proper name. Its meaning as a common noun has received sufficient comment in the last chapter. We shall now notice it as the proper name of some wind. We have a variety of such names, as "sirocco," "simoom," and others. The name of a wind necessarily implies that the wind so named has a distinct identity, and usually blows in a certain direction for a fixed and somewhat lengthened period, as three months, or six months, though some receive their names only because of some disagreeable or positive quality. The question here for us to solve is the location of the wind, designated in the Greek by the name "Lips," "Libos."

The word "Libonotos" was the name of a wind blowing east of Africa, and south of Asia. This could be no other than the southern monsoon.

In relation to this monsoon, we are told that, "in the tract between Sumatra and the African coast, and from three degrees south latitude, quite northward to the Asiatic coast, including the Arabian Sea and the Gulf of Bengal, the monsoons blow from September to April on the north-east, and from March to October on the south-west." "The trade winds in some parts are subject to a change of direction every six months, and are then called monsoons. When the northern hemisphere is exposed to the sun's rays, Arabia, Persia, India and China being greatly heated, raise the temperature of the atmosphere that covers them, and the cooler air from the regions south rushes towards the parts. It will therefore follow, that for one six months the trade wind is, in this instance, produced by a current of air rushing from the equatorial regions." And another writer says: "It is in the Indian seas, however, and especially in the vicinity of the great Asiatic continent, that the disturbing influence of the land is most clearly exhibited, issuing in a complete reversal of the north-east trade during a considerable portion of the year; and the production of monsoons, that is, of winds which blow half the year in one, and the other half in a contrary direction."

The south-west monsoon commences north of the equator, and, driving in a north-east direction from the coast of Africa, passes over the south-east desert of Arabia, and thence over the southern part of Persia.

To return to "Libonotos." It is composed of two Greek words, namely, "Lips," or "Libos," the genitive, and "Notos," south. Now, as we know that "Lips" is the name of a wind, and, connected with Notos, it means the "southern monsoon;" if we separate Notos, southern, it leaves only Libos—monsoon. As this southern monsoon originates near the coast of Africa, and pervades Southern Persia, we can hardly escape the conclusion that "Apo Libos" [if a proper name here] should be rendered "from the region or direction of the monsoons." And as the monsoon could be reached from the Holy Land, and from other countries most interested in the prophecy, in no other direction by land, than through Persia (except over the desert of Arabia), it seems a just conclusion that the country from which the he-goat must come was that very land ruled by Chosroes.

It is a significant coincidence that "Libos," a common noun, describes Persia so perfectly as "a country full of rocks," while "Libos," a proper name, seems to point, unmistakably, to the same country as the locality of the monsoons.

One mode of proof, to sustain the position that the he-goat symbolized Macedonia, is certainly unique. The writer, a firm believer in that position, presents his proposition as follows: "The prophet Daniel describes Macedonia, under the emblem of a goat with one horn; and it is therefore of great consequence, that this symbol should be proved to be that proper to Macedonia; for if this country had no such emblem belonging to it, we must look to another kingdom for a fulfillment of the prophecy, which would be contrary to history, and would produce inextricable confusion." It must strike every one, that in this short extract the writer ignores inductive reasoning and begs the question two or three times over.

The only cases cited to prove that the one-horned goat was the symbol of Macedonia, are,

1st, In the reign of Archelius, of Macedon, "there occurs on the reverse of a coin of that kingdom the head of a goat having one horn."

2d, "An ancient bronze figure of a goat with one horn was dug up in Asia Minor!"

Now as Asia Minor had often been conquered by the Persians, and at one time been in their possession for twelve successive years, why should it be taken for granted that this bronze figure was Macedonian rather than Persian? Macedonia was nearer to Asia Minor, to be sure, but, under the circumstances, the probabilities that the figure was Persian, were far greater than that it was Macedonian.

3d. Another fact is mentioned as of very great significance: "In one of the Pilasters of Persepolis, a goat is represented with an immense horn growing out of the middle of the forehead; and a man in Persian dress, is seen by his side, holding the horn with his left hand; by which is signified the subjection of Macedon." Every one must see that here the question is begged again. These are the only instances given, although it is added that Mr. Combe observes that not only many of the individual towns in Macedon employed this type, but the kingdom itself "was represented also by a goat, with this particularity, that it had but one horn."

On the other hand, we are told that "Persia was represented by a ram." Ammianus Marcellinus acquaints us, that "the king of Persia, when at the head of his army, wore a ram's head made of gold." And then we are further informed that "the type of Persia, the ram, is observable on a very ancient coin, undoubtedly Persian, in Dr. Hunter's collection." It will be observed that here again the question is begged, and the item of evidence depends upon the opinion that the coin was Persian, while, prima facie, the great probability is that it was Assyrian or Babylonian.

Mr. Combe further says (after giving a representation of a head of a ram and a one-horned goat): "It will be seen by the drawing I have made of this gem, that nothing more nor less is meant by the ram's head with two horns, and the goat's head with one, than the kingdoms of Macedonia and Persia represented under their appropriate symbols." This again begs the question; but if the application be correct, the probability appears just as strong that the one horn represented Persia as the contrary.

The resources of the writer have been very limited, indeed, so far as numismatics are concerned. But his investigations have resulted thus: In Rees' Cyclopædia, under "Medals," we find this statement: "It was in the reign of Servius Tullius that the first Roman coins appeared, which were large pieces of brass, rudely impressed, only on one side, with the figure of an ox, a ram, or some other animal." This was near 700 years before Christ. There is a copper medal, of the reign of Britannicus, in Captain Smyth's collection, upon the reverse of which is the figure of a ram. This was not far from the Christian era.

In Calmet there is given the copy of a medal "in proof that Macedonia was divided into several provinces (four, at least,) when under the Roman government." This, therefore, was undoubtedly a Macedonian medal. This medal has the head of a ram on one side; and a complete ram, reclining, on the reverse.

Here are three distinct cases where the ram, with horns, was used symbolically by the Eastern or Western Empires.

In addition to the above, a significant fact is mentioned by Bishop Chandler, who observes that “princes and nations being of old painted by their symbols, which Procopius calls GNÖRISMATA, they came afterwards to be distinguished by writers with the names of their symbols as by their appellations. Yet Alexander derived himself from Jupiter Ammon, and he and his successors had two ram's horns on their coins, the very description of the former beast.”

We are further told that “Jupiter Ammon was usually represented under the figure of a ram; though, in some medals, he appears of a human shape, having only two ram's horns growing out beneath his ears.” And accordingly Alexander and his successors placed the symbol of a ram's horns around their ears, which may be seen on various coins and medals, which may be fairly set off against the story of Ammianus Marcellinus.

Turning now to Persia, we have given before all the proof within our reach of the ram as a Persian symbol. The figure of a ram is found among the sculptures of Persepolis, but it is placed indiscriminately along with lions, deer, bulls, horses and camels, with no mark of distinction whatever.

On the other hand, goats and other animals with one horn are found sculptured everywhere. Mr. Combe gives the instance before quoted, of “a goat with an immense horn growing out of the middle of his forehead."

"In the general procession which adorns the palace of Persepolis, there appears the emblem of two goats, each having one horn." This is found in other instances, especially upon the pillars around the porticoes.

Among the ornaments of the palace are many hundred figures sculptured in basso relievo.

Le Bruyn gives the following account of some of those upon the pilasters:

"Under a portal of the west is the figure of a man hunting a bull, who has one horn in his forehead."

"The second portal discovers the figure of a man carved in the same manner, with a deer, that greatly resembles a lion, having a horn in his forehead."

"The same representations are to be seen under the portal to the north, with this exception, that, instead of the deer, there is a great lion."

"There are also two other figures on each side in the two niches to the south, one of which grasps the horn of a goat with one hand."

"Another of these sculptures also represents a man who, with one hand, seizes the (single) horn of an animal which he has attacked."

Here are a great variety of sculptures representing an animal with one horn, of which many are goats. Can we draw any other inference from these facts than that the one-horned animal was a symbol adopted and recognized by Persia? And we are supported in this opinion by the unquestionable fact, that Media, then an integral part of Persia, was so symbolized.

The author before quoted says: "This (the two goats with one horn each sculptured at Persepolis) would be extremely embarrassing if we did not know that these two Medias being, as they were, in some respects, but one province, though divided, so they were represented by two goats walking together." He therefore concludes that "Media was symbolized by the single-horned goat, and that the Macedonians, being derived from thence, retained the symbol of their original country."

Without stopping to comment upon the obvious fact that the conclusion is altogether too far-fetched to be of any value, we suggest whether, as Media and Persia had become consolidated into one nation, it would not be far more reasonable to assume that the consolidated nation had adopted the original and national symbol of one of them.

The one-horned goat was a frequent symbol with the Assyrians, and Layard has the remark, that, at

“the period of the fall of the Assyrian empire, and of the rise of the kingdoms of Babylon and Persia, the arts passed from Assyria to the sister nations.”

In conclusion, while the writer does not place as much confidence as some others in any numismatrical arguments or those drawn from sculptures, they nevertheless do appear much more to strengthen his view of the case than the other.

There is a passage which, giving its popular meaning, may seem to conflict with our view in an important particular. The passage is in the second verse of the eleventh chapter, and is as follows: “Behold, there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia; and the fourth shall be far richer than they all: and by his strength through his riches, he shall stir up all against the realm of Grecia.” The fourth king is commonly supposed to refer to Xerxes. If you begin with Cyrus, Xerxes was the fifth king, and the language seems to imply that he is the first; and, if so, the text does not refer to Xerxes. That king has been called “the great.” In what did his greatness consist? He raised an army, if we may believe the historian, of over 2,000,000 of men. But the greatness of this army proved his utter unworthiness of the title given him. His vast army was successfully resisted at Thermopylæ by 300 Spartans and 1100

Thespians and Thebans, until betrayed by a villain. He burnt the empty houses of Athens, and got sadly beaten in the battle of Salamis; and here ends his military history. "In his precipitate retreat he left behind him all his riches and magnificence."

We suggest whether the word king here does not really mean dynasty, provided we are to understand the language literally.

Cyrus was king of Persia at the time of Daniel's prophecy. Thus, the Archæmenian dynasty ended with Darius Codomannus, and was succeeded by Alexander and the Seleucian, 324 B. C. In 255 the Parthians founded the third Persian dynasty—the Arsanean of classic writers. This dynasty lasted till A. D. 226, under thirty-four monarchs. In the beginning of the third century, "Adishir, of the Persians, founded the Sasanian dynasty, which, under twenty-eight or twenty-nine kings continued upwards of 400 years."

Near the close of this (fourth) dynasty reigned Chosroes, styled "the great," "who is considered by the Persians a model of justice, generosity and sound policy. His reign of forty-eight years—from A. D. 531 to 579, was the golden age of modern Persia."

"He received, as tokens of homage, ambassadors, with rich presents, from the greatest potentates of the East, at his splendid palace at Ctesiphon, one of the wonders of that part of the world." "His empire extended from the Red Sea to the Indus."

His grandson, Chosroes II., "is still more celebrated in the East for his luxury and magnificence; and Oriental history abounds in tales of his palaces, his superb thrones, his immense treasures, his unrivalled poets and musicians, his 50,000 Arab horses and his 3,000 beautiful women."

And, speaking of Dastagerd, Chosroes' capital, the writer says: "Its marvelous beauty and pomp have been extolled by visitors and poets; and even grave historians speak minutely of its paradise (or park), containing pheasants, peacocks, ostriches; roebucks and wild goats; of its lions, tigers, destined for the pleasure of the chase; of the 960 elephants, 20,000 camels, 6,000 mules and horses; of the 6,000 guards that watched before the gates; of the 12,000 slaves and 3,000 women subjected to his caprices and passions; of the precious metals, gems, silks, aromatics in a hundred subterranean vaults of the palace; of its 30,000 hangings, 40,000 columns, and of its cupola, with 1,000 globes of gold, imitating the motion of the planets and the constellations of the zodiac."

Even the writer of the "Arabian Nights" refers to his riches: "The lady Zobeide pulled off from her neck a necklace worth the treasures of a Chosroes."

We have before had occasion to refer to the power, conquests and cruel treatment of both Jews and Christians of the second Chosroes; and as this was the fourth dynasty from and including Cyrus, we submit to the judgment of the reader whether the "fourth king," far richer than they all, does not apply to this dynasty with much more propriety than to the luckless Xerxes.

The war between Heraclius and Chosroes was considered as much a religious as a civil war; and, being destitute of means to repel the enemy, Heraclius "had recourse to the clergy, who were more immediately concerned in this quarrel; of whom, therefore, he borrowed all the vessels of gold and silver belonging to the churches of Constantinople, which he coined into money, wherewith to pay his soldiers, who were marching to fight in defence of their lives, their liberties and religion."

It will further be remembered, that, in the seventh verse of the eighth chapter, the prophet states that he saw the he-goat "come close unto the ram." Now this phraseology seems to imply very decidedly, that whatever power is referred to, did not overrun the country of the ram, only coming near to it; but, by some other means or mode, broke his power, humbled and trampled him under foot. Alexander not only came close unto Media and Persia, but overrun them both; and, not stopping there, conquered immense territories beyond them. His thus passing over and subjugating Media and Persia, and then carrying his conquests a thousand miles beyond, seems to be very imperfectly described by the phrase "came close unto."

It is also stated by the prophet, "that the he-goat waxed very great; and when he was strong, the great horn was broken." The breaking of a horn seems to imply something more than a natural death. It can mean nothing less than a power violently destroyed, or greatly humbled by another power. But Alexander died in the plenitude of his prosperity, in his own bed, leaving his kingdom the most powerful on earth.

There is no author who more confidently maintains that the he-goat was Alexander, than Rollin; and, in order to substantiate his position, he cites from Daniel, that "the great horn was broken; and there came up four notable ones, towards the four winds of heaven;" and then shows how Alexander's domains were divided—not by any violence, but by mutual consent. "In Europe," he says, "Thrace and the adjacent regions were conveyed to Lysimachus;" "and Macedonia, Epirus and Greece were allotted to Antipater and Craterus." "In Africa, Egypt and the other conquests of Alexander in Libya and Cyrenaica, were assigned to Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, with that part of Arabia which borders on Egypt." "In Lesser Asia, Lycia, Pamphylia and the greater Phrygia, were given to Antigonus; Cavia to Cassander;" "Lydia to Menander;" "the Lesser Phrygia to Leonatus;" "Armenia to Neoptolemus;" "Cappadocia and Paphlagonia to Eumenes;" "Syria and Phoenicia fell to Leomedon;" "one of the two Medias to Atropates," "and the other to Perdiccas;" "Persia was assigned to Peucestes;" "Babylonia to Archon;" "Mesopotamia to Arcesilas;" "Parthia and Arcania to Phrataphernes;" "Bactriana and Sogdiana to Philip." "The other regions were divided among other generals whose names are now but little known."

Thus, instead of the four horns which were to come up out of the great broken horn of Alexander, we see his empire peaceably distributed to, at least, eighteen sovereigns, and it would be difficult to select out of these the four more notable than some other four, equally so. Indeed, it is difficult to discover, in any possible aspect, the least resemblance between the disintegration of the empire of Alexander and the prophetic end of the he-goat. It is true that thirty years after the death of Alexander his former dominions were measurably reunited, and a part of them formed nominally into four governments. But, after a very short time, the whole were again reduced to a chaotic state, and out of them there arose nothing like the fifth horn till after the lapse of 900 years.

Let us now turn to this part of the history of Chosroes, and ascertain how far the actual exploits and the succession of that monarch correspond with the prophecy. We are told that "during the life of Maurice" (Roman emperor) "peace was preserved between the two nations" (Persia and the empire). "But on his assassination by Phocas in 602, Chosroes took up arms to revenge the death of his benefactor; and in the space of fourteen years subdued almost all the provinces of the Greek empire. In 611 Antioch was taken; in the following year Cesarea, the capital of Cappadocia, fell into the hands of the Persians; in 614 the whole of Palestine was subdued; in 616 Egypt was conquered, and Alexandria was taken by Chosroes himself, while another Persian army subdued the whole of Asia Minor, and advanced as far as the Bosphorus. The Roman empire was on the brink of ruin. The capture of Alexandria had deprived the inhabitants of Constantinople of their usual supply of corn; the northern barbarians ravaged the European provinces, while the powerful Persian army on the Bosphorus was making preparations for the siege of the imperial city. His victorious troops remained encamped for twelve years in the vicinity of Constantinople." He reduced Heraclius and the empire to the very lowest condition of abject humility, and fairly "stamped upon them," insomuch that Heraclius offered to make peace with him on any terms he would propose.

But it will be observed that Heraclius was not actually subdued, nor the Roman Empire, properly speaking, actually invaded; but Chosroes with his Persian hosts "came close unto" the very capital of the Empire. At the time of Chosroes' invasion, very near, if not quite, half the Christians in the world were found in Asia. These were all subjected by Chosroes, and the cruel and diabolical manner in which he maltreated and murdered them as Christians, could not be better expressed than by the casting down, and stamping upon them.

The great difficulty with the prophecy lies in the explanation given by the angel: "The ram which thou sawest, having (two) horns (are) the kings of Media and Persia." Upon this it may be remarked that a horn is always the emblem of power. At the time of the conquest of Persia by Alexander, Media was not a power, nor in any way independent; it had been absorbed in the empire of Persia. It would, therefore, seem no more proper to represent it as a distinct horn, than the other provinces, which had, successively, been conquered and absorbed into that state. But it is a well authenticated fact, that after the subversion of Media, and her incorporation into Persia, very many of the customs of Media were adopted by Persia; and it seems almost certain that the symbol of a one-horned goat was so adopted; and this presumption is much strengthened by the inscription of this emblem so often appearing about the palace of Persepolis.

A well-informed writer says: "Madai was the third son of Japheth, and father of the Medes." "But," he adds, "some suppose that Media is too distant from the other countries peopled by Japheth, and cannot be comprehended under the name of the 'Isles of the Gentiles,' which were allotted to the sons of Japheth."

And again, Calmet says, "Media, a country east of Assyria, which is supposed to have been peopled by the descendants of Madai, son of Japheth. The Greeks maintain that this country (Media) takes its name from Medus, son of Medea; and truly if what has been said, under the article 'Madaï,' may be relied on, or if this son of Japheth peopled Macedonia, we must seek another origin for the people of Media." In another place in Calmet we find, "Gomer was probably the father of the Cimbri, Magog of the Scythians, and Madaï of the Macedonians."

We have cited these authorities to show how strong the testimony is that Macedonia was, and Media was not, peopled by the descendants of Madaï; for if Media was not, then the prophecy does not at all refer to the Medes; but if Macedonia was, as the word Madaï is used by the prophet, the whole force of the argument is transferred from Media to Macedonia: and so, as at that time the Roman Empire had been extended to the Bosphorus, and included Macedonia as well as all Greece, and the civil government had been transferred from Rome to Constantinople, while the ecclesiastical [the little horn] remained at Rome, it would not be inappropriate to symbolize the Eastern Empire by the horn of Macedonia, it being a representative kingdom of that part of the empire.

On this very important point, we may be permitted to adduce another piece of corroborative evidence of our correctness, in supposing the ram to symbolize the hierarchy. In Mr. Faber's essay on the symbolical language of prophecy, he remarks: "In the rich imagery of Daniel and St. John, different symbols are used to signify the same thing; but no one symbol is ever used to express different things, unless such different things have a manifest analogical resemblance to each other." Let us bear this rule in mind while we examine the following paragraph from the Apocalypse, 19th chap. 11th verse: "And I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth, and he had two horns like a lamb, and he spake as a dragon." Upon this Bishop Newton says, "The beast with two horns like a lamb, is the Roman hierarchy."

This appearance of the hierarchy, as a lamb with two horns, refers to that ecclesiastical power in its early state of existence, before it had attained the power of coercion and persecution. At that time, as a Christian institution, while it was, as yet, only reaching after absolute authority over the minds and bodies of men, it was very aptly represented as a lamb, a lamb, however, with horns; that is to say, a lamb which, in the ordinary course of events, and by the regular process of nature, would in a little time become a full-grown ram. Adopting the rule of symbols laid down by Faber, and the comment of Newton upon the passage cited, it seems impossible to avoid the conclusion, that the ram in Daniel, standing before the river, with horns, or, if you please, "with two horns," represents the hierarchy, or, as then constituted, the whole Christian world, under the domination of the Pope of Rome, and according to Faber, could not represent Persia.

CHAPTER XI.

THE HOLY CITY TRODDEN DOWN OF THE GENTILES 1260 YEARS.

AFTER the death of Chosroes his empire fell to pieces, and formed the separate nationalities of Persia, Arabia, Egypt, and the country between Persia and Europe, which became a part of the Roman Empire; thus constituting four horns where but one had existed before, all of them sufficiently notable. This condition of affairs, however, continued but a very short time, for out of one of them, namely, Arabia, "came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great." To this is added in our version, "toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land." The Septuagint has it "pros noton pros dunamin—"toward the south with power." The one translation answers our purpose as well as the other. If the Septuagint reading be adopted, the whole passage will read, "And out of one of them, towards the city shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled, we inquire again, with deep interest, if there be in all Scripture any clue to the length of time that this subjection shall continue. Pursuing our inquiry, we turn to the second verse of the eleventh chapter of the Apocalypse, where the revelator gives an answer to this precise question: "The Holy City shall be trodden under foot (of the Gentiles) forty and two months," or 1260 prophetic years. We thus learn, in the most concise and definite terms, exactly when this Mahometan despotism will cease in the country of Palestine; that is to say, in 1260 years from the year 637—1897, at which time we may anticipate, with great confidence, the entire annihilation of the Mahometan power.

To pursue this inquiry a little further, the "Host" was to be trodden under foot. It is well known that "Host" is used by way of abbreviation for hostia, a victim or sacrifice offered to the Deity. "In this sense 'Host' is more immediately understood of the person of the word incarnate, who was offered up a host, or hostia, to the Father on the cross, for the sins of mankind." Without intending to go into any elaborate explication of this matter, we submit that the desecration of the Holy City and all its sacred associations and surroundings, and the contempt with which Christ and his doctrines and followers have been treated, and the persecutions they have endured from the Saracens and the Mahometans, may well be presumed to be referred to by the angel when he spoke of the "Host" being trodden under foot, and that the same events are foreshadowed in these expressions by Daniel, our Saviour and St. John. Adding no more here, occasion will be offered to refer to the same matter in the sequel.

south, came forth, with power, a little horn, which waxed exceeding great."

Let it be remembered that Chosroes was overthrown and his kingdom destroyed in 628. About the year 607 Mahomet first concocted his baleful enterprise, and soon thereafter commenced his public ministry, propagating his pernicious doctrines among his own countrymen in Arabia, where the heresy spread with incredible rapidity, gaining adherents in vast multitudes. The people were buried in profound ignorance, and divided into a multitude of sects, all pagan and idolatrous. When he found his doctrine almost universally received there, he placed himself at the head of a company of thieves and fugitive slaves, who fled from all parts to him, allured by a promise he had given of protecting them, and by a law he had taught and published that it was the will and command of God that all men should be free. By the help of these proselytes he assumed a sovereign power, and declared himself both king and prophet of the Saracens.

"Such was his success, that with these feeble beginnings he subjected all Arabia, and having overcome the Persians in the year 632, seized on the government also. The Saracens, finding themselves masters of that country, made incursions into Palestine. Jerusalem held out against Aumar for two years together, but surrendered at last in the year 637."

In Smith's Dictionary, article "Jerusalem," we are told "the patriarch Sophronius surrendered to the Khaliff Omar in person, A. D. 637. The Khaliff, after ratifying the terms of capitulation, entered the city, and was met at the gates by the patriarch. Sophronius received him with the uncourteous exclamation, 'Verily, this is the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet.'"

Now, let us bear in mind that having ascertained that the sanctuary should be cleansed, that is antichrist overthrown by the collapse of the Roman hierarchy in the year 1867, our design now is to ascertain also when we may expect a like catastrophe to the Mahometan sovereignty, at least in the Holy Land. And learning that Jerusalem fell a prey to the Saracens in the year 637, we turn to the gospel of Luke, chap. 21 and 24th verse, where we find our Lord informing his disciples that "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled." Having learned, then, that Jerusalem was captured by the Saracens, most emphatically "Gentiles," in the year 637, and having also been informed that that which he ruled;" but that it was plucked up by Heraclius and afterwards passed under the dominion of the Arabian caliphs. Men may differ in their appreciation of these matters; but, seemingly, it must impress every one that these descriptions in Daniel are almost perfect photographs of Chosroes and the subsequent Saracenic and Mahometan caliphs. Passing over the intermediate portions of chapter eleven, which seem to be unmistakable descriptions of what are sometimes denominated holy wars, or the wars between the nominally Christian and the Mahometan and infidel nations, we proceed to a consideration of the last verse in the chapter, which quite as unmistakably refers to the Mahometan power in possession of Palestine.

"And he shall plant the tabernacle of his palace between the seas, in the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end and none shall help him." The meaning of this passage appears too plain to admit of any elucidation. The chapter commences with a brief account of the origin of the Mahometan sway in the Holy Land, and in the countries adjacent; and after recounting, among other things, their various successes and defeats, it ends with the affirmation that this power was at last fully established in that land; and then closes emphatically with the statement that "he shall come to his end and none shall help him."

Our present aim is to prove by cumulative evidence when this Mahometan sway shall come to its end. We have before learned from Scripture that the Holy City shall be trodden down by the Gentiles 1260 years. The fact is also affirmed by Daniel in the seventh verse of the twelfth chapter. Now it will be borne in mind that the eleventh chapter is devoted mostly if not altogether to those matters in which the Mahometan power was chiefly concerned; and that it begins and ends with reference to the same power. Another matter is then advanced, which we shall soon discuss, beginning at that same period, between which and the seventh verse of the twelfth chapter, nothing of any importance is revealed affecting time. But in the sixth verse, some one inquires of an angel, "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" The prophet says: "I heard the man clothed in linen, when he held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and sware by Him that liveth forever and ever, that 'it shall be for a time, times and a half.'"

Under these circumstances it cannot be believed that this period of 1260 years synchronizes with the same period mentioned in the twenty-fifth verse

CHAPTER XII.

THE SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED.

WE cannot doubt that the eleventh chapter of Daniel is almost entirely devoted to a foreshadowing of the various religious wars and revolutions which have taken place, and will occur, between the first taking away the daily sacrifice, and the setting up the abomination that maketh desolate in the year 607, and the overthrow of Mahometanism; including the wars of the crusades, and the frequent and desolating incursions of the Mahometans into Europe. But it does not fall within the scope of our design to attempt an elucidation of this portion of the prophecy, or to use it any further than is necessary to the full understanding of our theory.

It is hardly possible for any one to doubt that the "mighty king" described in the third verse of this chapter is the same with the "he-goat" in the fifth verse of the eighth chapter; and the revelations in the fourth and fifth verses of this chapter point to the same transactions with those from the sixth to the ninth inclusive, in the eighth chapter. If the former explication of those verses in our eighth chapter be correct, then here the eleventh chapter introduces, most appropriately, again the Mahometan power, which through the succeeding 1260 years was to exercise so marvellous an influence upon the Christian world, and especially upon the Holy Land.

“And a mighty king shall stand up, that shall rule with great dominion, and do according to his will.” If we mistake not, this refers to Chosroes, king of Persia, in his early prosperity. “And when he shall stand up, his kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided toward the four winds of heaven.” After he had become the terror of the Christian world, Heraclius, the emperor, in a very short time utterly demolished him and his kingdom. “And not to his posterity, nor according to his dominion, which he ruled; for his kingdom shall be plucked up, even for others besides those.” We have, in a former chapter, seen how completely Chosroes’ empire was subverted and “divided toward the four winds;” and how the succession passed “not to his posterity,” “nor according to his dominion, of the seventh chapter. It has already been proved that that refers to the time during which the saints were delivered into the hand and held by the power of antichrist, commencing when the daily sacrifice was taken away, and ending at the cleansing of the sanctuary in 1867. But this in the twelfth chapter as clearly refers to the question not answered by Palmoni in the thirteenth verse of the eighth chapter: "How long shall the host be trodden under foot?" The question in the sixth verse of the twelfth chapter is not in the same form, but doubtless refers to that, as well as to other matters, as recorded in the beginning of the twelfth chapter: "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" Now we have already learned from profane history, that Jerusalem was conquered by the Saracens in the year 637, and the passages quoted from the New Testament, as well as this now under consideration, prove that it must be trodden down of the Gentiles 1260 years, which will end in 1897.

In the eleventh verse of the twelfth chapter we are told that from "the time the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be 'a thousand two hundred and ninety (days) years.'" It appears, therefore, that from the time when Boniface was constituted Universal Bishop, and Mahomet concocted his heresy, to the year in which it has been proved Jerusalem will have been trodden down of the Gentiles 1260 years; that is, from the year 607 to the year 1897 is the time mentioned in this eleventh verse, namely 1290 years. If this be not the true exposition of this passage, the coincidences are certainly most remarkable.

We state, then, these propositions, which seem to be most clearly proved,

First, The saints were delivered into the power of antichrist in the year 607, and, consequently, will be delivered out of his hands by his overthrow in 1867. And,

Second, The Holy Land, and especially Jerusalem (the "Host"), were commenced to be trodden under foot of the Gentiles in 637; and, consequently, will be delivered from their oppression in 1897.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE RESTORATION OF THE JEWS.

WE will now proceed to the consideration of some other events, recorded in this prophecy, of the most stupendous importance, but depending for the period of their fulfillment, not upon any specified epoch; but the time of their development being in each case a corollary or sequence from those others which have heretofore been considered at large.

The closing paragraph of the eleventh chapter declares, that "he shall plant the tabernacles of his palaces between the seas, in the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end and none shall help him." In the beginning of the next (12th) chapter, the prophet presents in the most vivid colors the scenes which are immediately to follow the overthrow of Mahometanism and speedily to usher in the millennium.

“At that time,” that is to say, at the time when the Mahometan power in Palestine shall come to an end, “at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince, which standeth for the children of thy people, and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time. And at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt.” These four or five distinct propositions are not necessarily coincident in time; but follow each, probably, in the order of arrangement. Truly, to comprehend their momentous import, in the mind of the prophet, we must place ourselves at his stand-point. Let us pause, then, here a moment to contemplate his peculiar and soul-stirring position.

Himself an exile from his country, he looks forward, in vision, through a period of more than two thousand years, and sees Jerusalem, the Holy City, the place beloved beyond all others by all Jews, whether present there or absent—he sees Jerusalem and the Holy Land, Palestine, the Land of Canaan, ages before promised to his nation, conquered by a new race of Pagans, “Gentiles,” whose very existence, as a people, commenced centuries after he saw this amazing vision. He sees this new power plant his tabernacles and erect his mosques between the seas, even in Jerusalem, the glorious holy mountain. He sees this resistless power enforce, by fire and sword, his own detestable heresies, for a long series of ages; but having before given a short summary of intervening events, deems it necessary here only to note the final decline and fall of that power by which the beloved land had so long been trodden in the dust. He describes this great event with characteristic and chastened brevity, but extraordinary power. "He shall come to his end and none shall help him." His eye now ranges down the vista of time, until the power that conquered and desolated the Holy City has fallen, never to rise again. But another event of equal, if not more thrilling interest, now flashes upon his vision, apparently without any lapse of intermediate time, after the destruction of Mahometanism. "At that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince, which standeth for the children of thy people," evidently signifying some event propitious to the rising fortunes of the Jewish nation, and these soul-stirring spectacles are followed immediately by a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time. How long this period would continue, he was not here told;

but it is quite evident that it must last for a series of years, to afford room for the fulfillment of all the troubles predicted. And then follows the announcement which must have been most trying to the faith of an early Hebrew, as the resurrection of the dead had been preached to them, if at all, in dubious and uncertain terms: "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." And then follows the other announcement—to him, of all others, the most interesting—that at the close of a time, times and half a time, 1260 years, from the same epoch, the subjugation of Jerusalem, there shall be an end to the dispersion of God's chosen people, and all the stupendous events in the future, which have been revealed him, shall be accomplished.

It is not possible for our imaginations to conceive of the glorious ecstasy of the prophet, at the close of these marvellous and astounding revelations. At a single view he sees his own people, through successive ages, scattered over the four quarters of the world, enduring the threatened punishment of God, in their persecutions, humiliations and sufferings unexampled in the history of our race; and then, at the close, he sees them restored to their own country, and exalted in the favor of God for above aught that they experienced in the most prosperous periods of their ancient history. We cannot doubt that his feelings of excitement and ecstasy very far transcended those which he assures us he experienced on a former occasion, not half so thrilling as the present : "I, Daniel, fainted and was sick ; and I was astonished at the vision ; I set my face toward the ground and I became dumb."

CHAPTER XIV.

THE SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED.

IN former times the restoration of the Jews to the Holy Land was universally believed, and formed a theme of constant public prayer. This custom has fallen very much into disuse ; not because the subject matter has become less interesting in itself, but from a lessened attention to it, growing out of the fact that so many anticipations, founded upon the prophecies, have been disappointed. For this reason let us group together a few paragraphs touching the subject, as found in the Old Testament. In Jeremiah, the 23d chapter and 7th and 8th verses : “ Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that they shall no more say, The Lord liveth, which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt ; but, The Lord liveth, which brought up and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them, and they shall dwell in their own land." A similar passage is found in Ezekiel, 36th chapter and 24th verse: "For I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you into your own land." In the 21st and 22d verses of the 37th chapter, we are told: "Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land; and I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall no more be two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all." In the 3d chapter of Hosea, the 4th and 5th verses, we are informed that "the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim. Afterwards shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king, and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days." Now, it is possible that some will say that all these, and numerous other prophecies of a like import, were fulfilled in the restoration of the Jews after the Babylonian captivity. Without spending time and space to controvert such a theory, we quote again from Amos, 9th chapter and 14th and 15th verses: "I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel, and they shall build the waste cities, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards and drink the wine thereof; they shall also make gardens and eat the fruit of them; and I will plant them upon their land; and they shall no more be pulled out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord thy God." Whatever may be thought of other passages quoted, it is quite certain that this cannot apply to the Jews in any period of their past history. Their present dispersion over the whole world is sufficient to refute any such proposition. Other passages appear to be quite as decisive as this, as in the 37th chapter of Ezekiel, 23d, 24th, 25th verses: "Neither shall they defile themselves any more with idols, nor with their detestable things, nor with any of their transgressions; but I will save them out of all their dwelling-places wherein they have sinned, and will cleanse them; so shall they be my people and I will be their God: and David my servant shall be king over them; and they shall have one shepherd, and they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt; and they shall dwell therein, even they and their children and their children's children forever; and my servant David shall be their prince forever." There seems no power of language, and no stretch of imagination, which can make this description agree with the past history of the Jews.

As a conclusion to these extracts, a quotation from Mr. Whiston's "Essay on the Revelation of Saint John," will be very applicable and appropriate: "Upon this occasion it will be fit to set down old Tobit's most famous prophecy, or rather interpretation of the more ancient prophecies, relating to the present grand dispersion of the Jews, and to their so much expected restoration; which prophecies have been so often misunderstood by our late Christian commentators. And this passage is the more remarkable because of its great antiquity, being written some time before several books of the Old Testament; and because, in the vulgar Greek copy, part of the most material point is omitted, and can now only be restored from a most ancient Hebrew version made from the original Chaldee, which version is still extant. The passage is this: "As to our brethren the Israelites who dwell at Jerusalem, they shall all be carried captive and Jerusalem shall be laid in heaps; and the house of God shall be desolate for a small time. Then shall the children of Israel ascend and rebuild the city and the temple ; but not according to the former building. And there shall they inhabit many days, until an age be completed. And then shall they depart again to an exceeding great captivity. But there also shall the Holy Blessed God be mindful of them, and shall gather them from the four parts of the world. Then shall Jerusalem the Holy City be restored with curious and stately building. And the temple also shall be magnificently built, never to be destroyed again forever and ever, as the prophets have foretold. Then shall these nations be converted ; they shall worship the Lord, and shall cast away the images of their gods ; and by a confessing of him shall give praises to his great name. He also shall exalt the name of his people before all nations."

If it be conceded that the Jews will be restored to their own land, these questions present themselves for our further consideration ; namely, Will the whole of those who claim to be the children of Abraham, now scattered to the four winds of heaven, and amounting in the aggregate to 5,000,000, be returned to the land of their ancestors ? Or, will only such as shall be converted to Christianity thus be restored ? And, whichever may be the case, when will this restoration be accomplished ? Reasoning a priori, we should say, without hesitation, that none could be returned to the Holy Land, but such as shall have cast off the Jewish religion and embraced Christianity; for their unbelief in a crucified Saviour, and the despite they have done him, have undoubtedly been the chief causes of their dispersion. Would it, then, be consistent with divine justice, and with the examples of God's treatment of sinners in all ages, to so severely punish the Hebrew race, as he has done, for near two thousand years, for a sin, and then, without any repentance for that sin, now remit the penalty to those who are certainly equally guilty in their unbelief? It may be, and, indeed, is, quite possible, that the whole Hebrew race shall repent and embrace Christianity, before the time for their restoration shall have expired; though such a universal repentance is not in accordance with our frequent experience.

In support of this view of the case, a multitude of passages might be quoted from other prophetic books than Daniel; a few will suffice. In the thirty-second chapter of Isaiah, beginning with the thirteenth verse: "Upon the land of my people shall come up thorns and briers," "because the palaces shall be forsaken," "the forts and towers shall be for dens forever, a joy of wild asses, a pasture of flocks, until the Spirit be poured out upon us from on high." "Then judgment shall dwell in the wilderness and righteousness remain in the fruitful field. And the work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance forever. And my people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwellings and quiet resting places." In the ninth chapter of Jeremiah, the sixteenth verse, it is said: "I will scatter them also among the heathen, whom neither they nor their fathers have known;" and then in the twenty-third chapter, fifth and sixth verses: "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely, and this is his name, whereby he shall be called, The Lord Our Righteousness." In the thirty-first chapter of Jeremiah, tenth and eleventh verses, it is written: "He that scattereth Israel, will gather him and keep him as a shepherd doth his flock. For the Lord hath redeemed Israel." Verse thirty-third: "This shall be the covenant I will make with the house of Israel, After those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be my people. They shall all know me from the least unto the greatest, saith the Lord ; for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more." So, too, in the paragraph before quoted from Hosea, third chapter and fifth verse : " Afterwards shall the children of Israel return and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and shall fear the Lord and his goodness, in the latter days." It seems, judging from these and such like statements, often repeated, that either all the Jews will be converted, before the day of their return, or only those who have so repented and believed, will be restored.

We are now prepared to analyze carefully the scope and meaning of the paragraphs relating to this matter in the twelfth chapter of Daniel ; from which we shall be able also, probably, to throw some additional light upon the question just presented. The first statement is in the first verse : "At that time," that is, simultaneously or immediately after the overthrow of Mahometanism—" At that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of my people." This plainly imports that the time has now arrived, in the course of Providence, when something favorable—some happy change is about to be meted out to the people of the Jews. In the close of the same verse, we are further informed that "at that time thy people (that is, the Jews,) shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book." Taking into consideration all the prophecies asserting the dispersion of that people; their sufferings during the long ages of that dispersion; and the promises of their final restoration, there can be no doubt that this announcement of the prophet, relates to their return, and fixes its commencement or preparation most incontestably, namely, immediately after the fall of Mahometanism in Palestine, which has been shown will occur in the year of our Lord 1897. The last sentence of the verse seems to confirm fully the former view expressed, of the restoration only of those who have cast off Judaism and become Christians: "Every one that shall be found written in the book," namely, all such as shall be converted to Christianity. Here, however, it will be observed that, intermediate in this verse, between the clause in which it is affirmed that "at that time" Michael shall stand up for the Jews, and the last one, "at that time," thy people shall be delivered, another clause is interposed, as follows: "And there shall be a time of trouble such as never was, since there was a nation." "At that time," in the commencement of the verse, refers undoubtedly to the destruction of the Mahometan power only ; while the use of the same phrase at the close of the verse, as evidently refers to the whole time of trouble, which will continue for a number of years. In itself, it is of small consequence whether their restoration is accomplished in one or forty years ; but we should presume, a priori, that the transition state would occupy a considerable time ; for the collection of half a million or five millions of people, from "the north country and from all countries," and their transportation by land and sea, to one point, would necessarily extend through a series of years. This is, however, a matter upon which no words need be wasted, inasmuch as intrinsically it is of very little importance when viewed in the light of their dispersion through so many ages.

CHAPTER XV.

THE TWELFTH CHAPTER OF DANIEL.

TO many, and probably the larger part of those who give but a casual attention to this subject, the twelfth chapter of Daniel seems a confused, incongruous and unintelligible mass of facts and dates, and in very many cases, the investigation of its meaning has been abandoned, as hopelessly obscure. But there is no portion of Revelation which will not pay for a diligent and careful research; and in our study of this chapter, although the conclusions reached, may be very much one side of the true interpretation of the predictions of the prophet, nevertheless they may, perhaps, be of some use, as a means of directing the minds of other enquirers into a truer path, and thus, at some future time of eliciting a more satisfactory explication of the great truths embodied therein.

We have, heretofore, endeavored to prove, by argument, founded upon specific prophecies, and if our premises be granted, it seems we have logically proved, that the twin delusions of Rome and Mahomet will terminate, so far as the supreme and ruling oppressive power is concerned, the one in 1867, and the other in 1897. And this great event, so far as the Mahometan domination over Palestine and the Holy City is concerned, was expressly affirmed in the last verse of the eleventh chapter: "He shall come to his end, and none shall help him."

It will be observed, however, that although we have established the fact that this will occur in 1897, the prophecies, on which this date is fixed, are not found in Daniel, so far as our investigations have yet gone, but upon the declaration of Christ and of Saint John in the Apocalypse. Laying aside for the present all reference to them, we now propose to confine our enquiry, as to time, to this prophecy of Daniel, barely calling in the aid of a single fact of profane history.

In the first two verses of the twelfth chapter we find a collection of most wonderful events foretold, all depending, in no small degree, upon the fact expressed in the last verse of the eleventh chapter, for their respective times of accomplishment; and now here a question of great interest arises, whether it be possible, by any fair course of argument, to fix with precision the several dates of the momentous events foreshown in this last chapter. Claiming no infallibility, we only desire a fair consideration of the positions we take in carrying out to their just conclusions, our theory of Daniel's prophecy.

We begin then with the year 607 and 637, as two fixed epochs, from which we are to make our deductions and reasonings of all the periods mentioned in this chapter, namely, the year 607, that in which the sanctuary was desecrated and the abomination of desolation set up, and 637, that in which the Host—the Holy City was first trodden under foot of the gentiles. And here, for the clearer illustration of the events recorded, we take occasion to submit a fact, which the course of our previous investigations has not rendered it necessary for us particularly to consider. It has often been claimed, by those who have written upon the subject, that Mahomet commenced the propagation of his heresy in the year 606. It doubtless occurred at or about that time. He was born in 569. According to some authorities 572. And historians inform us that he begun his public ministry in the fortieth year of his age, and it may be presumed that his system was inaugurated not long before the year 608. Without therefore pretending to fix the date of the birth of that pernicious heresy with historical exactness, we may assume with as much confidence as properly belongs to the subject, that this occurred in the year 607 or 608, or the same year that the Bishop of Rome was created by Phocas Sovereign Pontiff. If this were so, the duplicated questions, as stated in the thirteenth verse of the eighth chapter, were with very great propriety placed in such juxtaposition; for the two great matters about which the enquiries were made, namely, the desecration of the sanctuary and the setting up of the transgression of desolation, would have had their origin coterminously. The questions were: "How long shall be the vision concerning first, the daily sacrifice, and second, the transgression of desolation, to give both, first, the sanctuary, and second, the Host, to be trodden under foot." Now, if our view of these questions be correct, it will be seen at once, that one answer would not meet both questions; for the sanctuary must be cleansed, a considerable time before the Host ceases to be trodden under foot. And so Palmoni expressly limits his answer to the first question—Two thousand (four) hundred (years), then shall the sanctuary be cleansed—thus leaving the other question unanswered.

Passing now again over to the twelfth chapter, "At that time," with which the first verse begins, is fixed and known the moment we can ascertain when the power mentioned in the preceding chapter shall come to his end. We now pass on to the question proposed in the sixth verse of the twelfth chapter. "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" Before this question was put, a great variety of intensely interesting matter had been disclosed to the amazed vision of the prophet; and it will be borne in mind that the things recorded in the eleventh as well as the twelfth chapters, were all manifested to him in one and the same vision. In this vision he had first been enlightened as to the domination of the Mahometans over the Holy Land, through the whole period of that domination to its close, and this comprises the whole of the eleventh chapter; he then goes on in the twelfth chapter, the first two verses, with the briefest possible statement of the other wonderful events to occur thereafter. At this point of time the question is asked: "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" We remark here, that, in this case, as in the thirteenth verse of the eighth chapter, it was impossible for one answer to meet the whole question, because matters were covered by the question which would end at different times. Such being the case, we inquire, to which of these times would the angel naturally give his first answer? Certainly to the matter first presented to the prophet in this vision—that is the matter contained in the eleventh chapter. To this we add, that it was impossible that he should answer in any other way; for the very revelation itself shows that the last verse of the eleventh chapter closed up one series of revelations; while the first verse of the twelfth chapter as plainly commenced another series. A single answer, therefore, carrying the time down to the conclusion of the last series, would, at least, greatly mislead the inquirer. Another consideration certainly fixes it upon the first series; for the other answer, which we shall soon consider, uses a negative pregnant of unanswerable force.

We therefore find the answer given in perfect consistency with this hypothesis. “I heard the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, when he held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and sware by Him that liveth forever and ever, that it shall be for a time, times and a half.” It will be observed that to this period of 1260 years, there is given neither beginning nor ending, which, upon any other presumption than that we have made, would amount to no answer at all; but upon our theory it is perfectly complete, for it declares that the Mahometan domination shall continue over the Holy Land for a time, times and a half; precisely coinciding also with the declaration in the second verse of the eleventh chapter of the Revelations, "The Holy City shall be trodden down of the Gentiles forty-and-two months;" in both cases, 1260 years.

Having thus disposed of the first answer of the angel, with a reasonable degree of confidence in the correctness of our interpretation, we proceed to the consideration of the other answer to the same question. Any one carefully studying the text, will perceive that although there are several matters proposed and unfolded to Daniel in this vision, yet they are all divisible, as to time, into two parts, and only two, the first coming down to the end of the eleventh chapter; the other comprehending all the rest. Having answered the first so distinctly, as we have before shown, the angel now, with equal perspicuousness, though without fixing the exact date, replies to the other branch of the question. Indeed, although no date be specifically stated, yet inferentially the time is fixed with perfect exactness. "When he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the Holy people, all these things shall be finished." Upon this we first remark, that the phrase "Holy people," does not mean a people free from sin, but that nation which has long been distinguished as the chosen people of God; and again, that there can be no possible doubt that the man clothed in linen intended to divide the time into two portions; the "time, times and a half," comprising one, and all subsequent to that constituting the other portion. The matters developed in the same "time, times and a half," forming one class; and all the other matters disclosed forming the other class. First, there shall be a "time, times, and a half." And then, after that, "when" he shall have accomplished his own purposes in scattering his chosen people, "all these things shall be finished;" and this is in perfect consistency with the revelations in the former part of the chapter. With the eleventh chapter ends all disclosures in relation to the subjects therein discussed; with the twelfth, new matters are proposed; first, the standing up of Michael "for the children of thy people." Second, the time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation. And then, as the last act in this most amazing drama, "Thy people shall be delivered." It is true, another scene of overwhelming interest follows this in the text; "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake;" but in point of fact it is evident that this is concurrent with the final closing up of the restoration of the Jews. We are thus apprised, with a surprising degree of positiveness and certainty, that the moment that this great event shall have been accomplished, to wit, the final restoration of the Jews, all the other events foretold by Daniel shall be finished. Another event is foretold of not less thrilling interest than either of the preceding, but which it was not necessary for us before to notice: At that time, coterminously with the close of all these soul-stirring events, Daniel was further informed that "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars forever and ever." The commencement of this period of happiness for the blessed and chosen would be the exact time when "many of them that sleep in the dust shall awake."

CHAPTER XVI.

1290 AND 1335 YEARS.

BUT it is apparent from what has been said, that up to the present time, nothing has been disclosed by the angel or shown by our argument, fixing the day and year when "all these things shall be finished." We know, to be sure, that they will be accomplished concurrently with another event; but, so far, we have had no express revelation by Daniel, disclosing in what year of our present era these events shall be finished.

At this point we are told by Daniel, that he heard but understood not. "Then, said I, O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things?" He is now addressed by the angel: "Go thy way, Daniel, for the words are closed up, and sealed till the time of the end." But although he thus assured Daniel that all future prophecy on these matters was sealed up, he nevertheless did not withhold some further information in answer to this last question ; not a new or further prophecy, but a few words by way of explanation of what had gone before ; that is to say, he makes his two answers to the former questions more intelligible.

The former answer to the first matter suggested was given, without specifying either beginning or ending, a "time, times and a half." Now, in giving further information, he is precise and specific, both as to beginning and ending, and to furnish corroborative proof, and at the same time leave no doubt of his meaning, he goes back to a fixed and perfectly well understood epoch, as before presented in the eighth chapter, and makes that his starting point, and not the time when Jerusalem surrendered to Aumar, which was the time referred to in his first answer, as well as by John in the Apocalypse. He now answers again : "From the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up." The first of these has already been proved to be the surrender of the whole Christian church to the despotic government of one man, Boniface, and his successors ; and as to the last, if our postulate be well founded, that the heresy of Mahomet, namely, was inaugurated in the year 607, then certainly this abomination of desolation was set up, in the same year, and this coupling them together, would be perfectly in accordance with the fact. "From the time that the daily sacrifice was taken away," (the supremacy of Boniface, 607,) "and the abomination that maketh desolate set up," (the inception of Mahometanism, also in 607,) "there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety" years. This seems to refer to the same matter in the first answer, before given, namely, the term and fall of the Mahometan power in the Holy Land; both should therefore terminate at the same time, and if they do, it would afford no slight presumption that they are both right. According to our former argument, the "time, times and a half," 1260 years from the subjection of Jerusalem, should end in the year 1897; so now here, too, 1290 years from the year 607, the time the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the abomination of desolation set up, will end in the same year.

It is not at all probable that from, or in a state of prosperity and power, this great empire of the Turks will be crushed in a day. Empires, like living beings, have their birth and growth and decay. Setting aside exceptional cases, the period of the decay of nations runs through a series of years; they consume, waste away, and are destroyed. In this case, it cannot be presumed that the great empire of Turkey will pass from a condition of power and prosperity to utter annihilation in a single year. We may rather expect that the Euphrates will dry up, will disappear after a season of years of decadence. In this case, we may well presume that much of this process of decay will precede, rather than succeed the designated period.

A peculiarity of Daniel in communicating his facts is worthy of notice. In the seventh chapter, he informs us that the saints should be delivered into the hands of the little horn, "for a time, times and the dividing of time," thereby indicating that the Church should be subjected to the Roman tyranny for a period of 1260 years; but he here gives neither the time of beginning nor ending. But in the next chapter he declares that the sanctuary shall be cleansed in 2400 years, from the time of his then present speaking, and then afterwards adds twenty-one years; thus fixing the time at which the subjection of the saints shall cease, with perfect exactness, namely the year 1867.

Precisely parallel with this is his mode of instruction, as to the domination of Mahometanism, in the twelfth chapter. In the seventh verse he informs us that "it will be for a time, times and a half," giving no indications when it will commence, or when it will end. But precisely as before, he afterwards shows by a different statement of the same facts, exactly when this "time, times and a half" will end, namely, in 1290 years after the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the transgression of desolation set up. There certainly is a very remarkable parallelism between the two cases.

A similar mode of presenting the fact is observed also in the other great disclosure of time. When he first gives an account of the closing up of the Christian dispensation, in the seventh verse of the twelfth chapter, he leaves the date entirely unexplained, except by reference to the accomplishment of another event: "When he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished." Although here the fact be affirmed with undoubted certainty, and the time will ultimately be certainly known, yet relying upon this prediction alone, it could not be known until the day of its fulfillment. But following this up, as he did in the other cases, he informs us in the following paragraph of the exact time when it shall be fulfilled. It is true, this time could not have been known to Daniel and students of his age, nor of any age, until Phocas' decree, except by a process of argument and reasoning scarcely to have been expected; yet to those who have lived since, it might have been known with great confidence, at any period of time.

CHAPTER XVII.

TWELFTH CHAPTER, TWELFTH VERSE.

TO the first question, "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, had given two answers, neither of which, however, would enable one standing in Daniel's position to fix any definite date.

To the second question, "What shall be the end of these things?" he has already given the further and needed information, explanatory of the first answer to the first question. The second answer to the first question was, "When he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished." He is now about to elucidate again this answer in the 12th verse, which he does by declaring, "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty" years. This is unquestionably intended as supplementary to the second answer to the first question, and to shed further light on the subject of that answer. The man clothed in linen, under the solemn oath he had taken, commenced the first of these two answers, by giving a stand-point from which to make his computation of the duration of the period now under investigation, "from the time the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up," from which epoch he had already made his first reckoning of "a thousand two hundred and ninety" years. He then proceeds in such terms as to leave no room for doubt, that in his next reckoning he dates from the same epoch; so that if the sentence were made full and complete, without reference to the former answer, it would read, "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty" years, from the time when the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up; thus giving us just as distinct a perception of the time to this blessed period, as had already been given of the time of the overthrow of Mahometanism in the Holy Land. If this view of the case be correct, then we have a flood of light poured upon the other parts of this chapter; for it will present this aspect: We are informed, first, that there shall be a time of unspeakable trouble; next, that "at that time" the people of the Jews will be delivered. We are then told that when this great event, the restoration of the Jews, shall be accomplished, all these things foretold by Daniel "shall be finished." And now in this 12th verse we are further informed, by the man clothed in linen, upon the waters of the river, under the obligation of a most solemn oath, that there will be a blessed time—undoubtedly, taking all these predictions together, referring to the very same event—there will be a blessed time in 1335 years, after the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate shall be set up, which we have shown, will be in the year of our Lord 1942.

We have now reached that point of our argument where we can make our computations of each several time expressed or implied.

It has been shown that the Mahometan, who has planted the tabernacle of his palace between the seas, in the glorious holy mountain, "shall come to his end" in the year 1897. Daniel was then informed that "Michael shall stand up for the children of thy people;" and next, and immediately coincident with that, "there shall be a time of trouble," and this time of trouble will continue until the same people shall be delivered, which we have shown, will be in the year 1942. Hence the inference is irresistible, that the time from the commencement to the end of the restoration will consume forty-five years; and the time of trouble will have precisely the same coincident duration; and during which, or more probably at the close of this momentous era, "many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt."

It would appear probable, judging from the phraseology above, that this is not the general resurrection; for not all, but many, shall awake, thus implying that there are others who will not now awake.

With a slight variation, which may be owing to some error in the translation, this seems to agree perfectly with the prediction, on the same theme, in the twentieth chapter of the Apocalypse, where the first resurrection is distinctly announced, while we have the assurance that the rest of the dead lived not again, "until the thousand years were finished," or until the close of the millennium.

The scope of our argument does not allow of any protracted comment upon the subject of the second resurrection; this lies altogether beyond what is called the Christian dispensation, at least so far as the revelation of Daniel extends, and, consequently, altogether beyond our assigned limits.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE CLOSE OF THE CHRISTIAN DISPENSATION.

AS Daniel probably comprehended the true meaning of these prophecies, when their language was merely repeated to him, no better than we should have done at that distant period, he says, that on hearing these solemn announcements, he understood not, and then exclaimed: "Oh! my Lord, what shall be the end of these things?" As the previous questions put by the prophet, or which he heard, differed essentially from each other, so this one is entirely different, in substance, from any of the others. For while the others related almost exclusively to time, this, on its face, made no allusion to time. "What shall be the end of these things?" comprises very much more than they; as not only time, but the closing scenes of all the amazing revelations unfolded to him, in vision, down to the end of the Christian dispensation, are comprehended in this last question. He is now informed that his position, or character, as the prophet of God, ceases, and that no further vision will appear to him. "The words are closed up, and sealed till the time of the end." There will be no new prophecy, on the matters which have been committed to Daniel, until their final accomplishment. The angel nevertheless answers the prophet's question, before closing up the words, by giving him the assurance that from the time the daily sacrifice shall be taken away and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be "one thousand two hundred and ninety (days) years." We remark here, that in this and the next verse he is giving to Daniel a summary, in few words, of all that has been communicated to him, through successive years, and in a variety of visions, all culminating in the same point, the final consummation of time, as connected with our present dispensation. And as, after the announcement of our Savior, the delivery of the saints into the hand of the antichristian power was the beginning of this series of prophecies, he takes that as his epoch from which he computes all these subsequent events. We now approach the last and, to all Christians, the most interesting, but most difficult to explain, of all the terms of years presented for our contemplation in this most wonderful revelation of Daniel. "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty (days) years." This period undoubtedly commences at the same time as the last, and will consequently end forty-five years after that, or, as a corollary from our former argument, in the year 1942. It will be observed that the solemn oath of the angel extends down to the announcement of the "blessed" period; or the end of the time of our present dispensation. This calls forcibly to our recollection a similar oath and parallel passage recorded in the Revelation, prescribing exactly the same result. In the tenth chapter: "The angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth, lifted up his hand to heaven, and sware by him that liveth forever and ever, who created heaven and the things that therein are; and the earth and the things that therein are; and the sea and the things that are therein, that there should be time no longer, But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God shall be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets."

In all the other cases of prescribed terms of time, some great event is foretold or recognized; but here we are simply informed that he is "blessed" who cometh to the end of the prescribed time. We may therefore, with much confidence, conclude that the termination of this period will usher in the morning of the millennium. It now appears that the lapse of time between the commencement of the Hebrew restoration and this final consummation of the Christian dispensation will be forty-five years. And the inquiry presents itself, What will happen, in the course of Providence, during this intermediate period? Judging from the varied references to this specific time, in the Scriptures, our inference is that it must be a period of astonishing and most marvellous disclosures.

In the first verse of the twelfth chapter we are told that immediately after the overthrow of the Mahometan power, "there shall be a time of trouble, such as there never was since there was a nation, even to that same time." The connection of this paragraph with the preceding part of the same verse, and with the last verse of the preceding chapter, together with the concluding sentence of this same verse, shows conclusively, that this time of trouble will begin with the introduction of—or a preparation for—the restoration of the Jews in 1897, and will continue during the subsequent forty-five years, until the "blessed" period, which begins in the year one thousand three hundred and five and thirty years after the constitution of Boniface Universal Bishop in 607, and the commencement of Mahomet's ministry, that is, the year 1942.

CHAPTER XIX.

ADDITIONAL AND CORROBORATIVE PROOFS FROM OTHER SCRIPTURES.

IT is now proposed further to elucidate some portions of this prophecy of Daniel, from other books of Scripture where reference is evidently made to the same subjects treated of by Daniel. In the sixteenth chapter of Revelation, in verses ten and eleven, we have an account of the pouring out of the fifth vial upon the seat of the beast. The occurrences which have taken place at Rome, in these times, going back to the year 1846, and so continuing down to the present day, are depicted with wonderful exactness in these two verses. As has been before shown, an effort was made by the Romans themselves to overthrow the papal government in 1846, which resulted in the expulsion of Pío Nono from Rome in 1847. The two verses referred to are as follows: "And the fifth angel poured out his vial upon the seat of the beast; and his kingdom was full of darkness; and they gnawed their tongues for pain; and blasphemed the God of heaven, because of their pains and their sores, and repented not of their deeds." By way of illustration of these graphic descriptions, let us here look at an "Encyclical letter" from the Pope soon after these disturbances: "To the Patriarchs, Primates, Archbishops and Bishops in communion with the Holy See: Venerable Brethren, The seditious movements which have lately broken out in Italy against the authority of legitimate princes, in countries nearest to the States of the Church, have invaded some of our provinces like the flames of a conflagration. Excited by this fatal example, and by intrigues abroad, they have thrown off our paternal rule, and in spite of their small numbers, the adherents of the revolt demand that they shall be subjected to that one of the Italian governments which of late years has been the adversary of the church, of its legitimate rights and of its sacred ministers. <sup>a</sup> Reproving and deploring the acts of rebellion, by which a portion only of the people in those disturbed provinces disregard with so much injustice our zeal and our paternal care, and declaring publicly that the temporal sovereignty, which the most perfidious enemies of the church of Christ are endeavoring to wrest from it, is necessary to the Holy See, in order that it may exercise, without any obstacle, its sacred power for the welfare of religion, we address you, Venerable Brethren, this present letter, in order to seek in the midst of such serious disturbances of public peace, some consolation for our sorrow. On this occasion we exhort you to see to the accomplishment of the prescription, which we read was formerly given by Moses to Aaron, the sovereign pontiff of the Hebrews: Take a censer and put fire therein from off the altar, and put on incense and go quickly unto the congregation and make an atonement for them, for there is wrath gone out from the Lord, the plague is begun. . . . Moreover, we solemnly declare that, possessed of the power from above which God, moved by the prayers of the faithful, will confer on our weakness, we will brave all perils and undergo all trials, sooner than fail in any respect in our apostolic duty, or do anything whatever against the sanctity of the oath by which we bound ourselves, when we were raised by God's will to the supreme seat of the Prince of the Apostles." In this the pontiff declares that the plague has begun; and then it equally appears that he repented not of his deeds.

Hereupon the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, "that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared." It has been herein before shown how the Mahometan power "shall come to his end, and none shall help him"—that is to say, shall gradually waste away, and in due time be totally annihilated, in accordance with the prophecy of Daniel; so now here the very same thing is foreshadowed in the Revelation, under the type of the river Euphrates being dried up, and in immediate proximity, following in both cases the destruction of antichrist. No one can reasonably doubt the reference, both in Daniel and St. John, to the same occurrences. It admits of more doubt precisely what is intended by "the way of the kings of the east being prepared." It is suggested whether, by the "kings of the east," in this place is not meant the chosen people of God; and if so, the drying up of the Mahometan despotism would surely prepare the way for their return to their own land. In behalf of the above suggestion, it may be argued with great force that we should give to the language of a writer, as near as possible, the same meaning in one paragraph which is its obvious meaning in another. Proceeding upon this principle, we look back to the first chapter of the Apocalypse, and, commencing with the fifth verse, we read, "And from Jesus Christ, who is the faithful witness, and the first begotten from the dead, and the prince of the kings of the earth, unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God." That the word kings is not used here in its common, secular acceptation is very apparent; and it is almost equally apparent that its use in the above sense would justify its application to the regenerated Jews, on their return to the Holy Land.

Now it will be borne in mind that Daniel declares, that immediately after the dissolution of the Mahometan power, and, indeed, linked to it, "there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time." So here, in the Apocalypse, the very next event foretold, as following the drying up of the Euphrates, and as a part of the same vial, the Revelator says: "I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the Dragon, and out of the mouth of the Beast, and out of the mouth of the False Prophet;" and in the sixteenth verse, "He gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue, Armageddon." And then the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air; and there came a great voice out of the temple of Heaven from the throne, saying, "It is done." And then comes on precisely the time of trouble mentioned more briefly by Daniel: "There were voices, and thundings, and lightnings; and there was a great earthquake, such as there was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake and so great." "And the cities of the nations fell; and great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath." "And there fell upon men a great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent: and men blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail; for the plague thereof was exceeding great." This account appears perfectly to corroborate the same events foretold by Daniel, ages before it was written by St. John in the Island of Patmos. Yet it is given here in language, and even in ideas so totally different, as to remove all suspicion that he was in any way copying from the predictions of the earlier prophets. We may also quote here, as an authority, corresponding to the prophecy of the same terrible woes, from our Savior, in explaining certain questions put by the apostles, of which more will be said hereafter. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days, shall the sun be darkened and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken ; and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn." This most evidently relates to the same subject, and agrees with both Daniel and the Apocalypse, in the substance of the prophecy. These days of tribulation are alluded to, or described by nearly all the prophets, in language at once varied and most impressive. In the seventh chapter of Daniel the prophet is shown at one glance, the close of the amazing scenes depicted in all his visions : " I beheld," says he, " till the thrones were set, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like pure wool ; his throne was the fiery flame, and his wheels burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him : thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him ; the judgment was set, and the books were opened. I beheld, even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame."

In Zechariah, 12th, 13th, and 14th chapters, we have a graphic narration, not only of the sorrows and tribulations to which the people will be subjected ; but also an affecting account of the appearance of our Savior among his people, and of the happy influences his presence will have upon them. "Behold, I will make Jerusalem a cup of trembling unto all the people round about, when they shall be in the siege both against Judah and against Jerusalem, and in that day will I make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all people. All that burden themselves with it shall be cut in pieces, though all the people of the earth be gathered together against it. In that day, saith the Lord, I will smite every horse with astonishment and his rider with madness." "In that day will I make the governors of Judah like an hearth of fire among the wood, and like a torch of fire in a sheaf, and they shall devour all the people round about, on the right hand and on the left. And Jerusalem shall be inhabited again in her own place, even in Jerusalem. In that day shall the Lord defend the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and he that is feeble among them, at that day shall be as David. And it shall come to pass in that day, that I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem. And I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace and of supplication; and they shall look upon me whom they have pierced; and they shall mourn for him as one that mourneth for his only son; and shall be in bitterness for him as one is in bitterness for his first-born."

So, too, the same thing is strikingly presented in Joel, second chapter: "Blow ye the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in my holy mountain: let all the inhabitants of the land tremble: for the day of the Lord cometh, it is nigh at hand: a day of darkness and of gloominess, a day of clouds and of thick darkness, as the morning spread upon the mountains; a great people and a strong: a fire devoureth before them, and behind them a flame burneth: the land is as the garden of Eden before them; and behind them a desolate wilderness; yea, and nothing shall escape them. Before their faces the people shall be much pained, the earth shall quake before them: the heavens shall tremble. The sun and moon shall be dark, and the stars shall withdraw their shining. And the Lord shall utter his voice before his army, for his camp is very great; for he is strong and executeth his word; for the day of the Lord is great and very terrible, and who can abide it? And I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood and fire and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come." "Let the nations be wakened and come up to the valley of Jehosaphat; for there will I sit to judge all the nations round about. Put ye in the sickle for the harvest is ripe. Come, get you down, for the press is full, for the fats overflow : for their wickedness is great : the sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining."

We add another like description from the nineteenth chapter of Revelations: "And I saw heaven opened, and behold a white horse, and he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True ; and in righteousness doth he judge and make war ; and his eyes were as a flame of fire, and on his head were many crowns ; and he had a name written that no man knew but himself. And he was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood ; and his name is called the Word of God. And the armies which were in heaven followed him upon white horses, clothed in linen white and clean. And out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations : and he shall rule them with a rod of iron. And he treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God. And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written King of kings and Lord of lords. And I saw an angel standing in the sun : and he cried with a loud voice, saying to all the fowls that fly in the midst of heaven, Come and gather yourselves together unto the supper of the great God, that ye may eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses and of them that sit on them, and the flesh of all men. And I saw the beast and the kings of the earth, and their armies gathered together to make war against him that sat on the horse and against his army. And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet, that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshiped his image: these were both cast alive into the lake of fire, burning with brimstone. And the remnant were slain with the sword of him that sat upon the horse, which sword proceeded out of his mouth."

An explanation of the various symbols used in this and other passages, does not fall within the scope of this argument. It is sufficient for my purpose to know that they foreshadow unspeakable woes, and are quoted only to illustrate the short paragraph from Daniel, "There shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation, even to that time." The word here rendered "trouble," really has a much more intensified signification in the original. Its first and most proper meaning is "throwing" or "dashing to the ground," and while there will be "troubles" such as have never before been, individually, witnessed among men, in addition to that, the whole fabric of society will be dashed to atoms; of which more will be found in the subsequent chapter.

CHAPTER XX.

SECOND PETER, THIRD CHAPTER, TENTH VERSE.

IT is now proposed to examine a passage in the second Epistle of Peter, in the third chapter, which is manifestly only another phase of the same terrific consummation, and which seems to have been greatly misunderstood. The passage especially referred to is the tenth verse, "But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in the which, the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up." Before any comments are made upon this passage, it will be proper to give some of the opinions heretofore entertained of it. The very judicious Mr. Scott says: "At that important catastrophe, the heavens and all the host of them, (so far at least as connected with this earth and its inhabitants,) will pass away and rush into confusion and destruction with a tremendous noise, of which thunder, earthquakes and all other convulsions of nature are wholly inadequate to give the least conception. Then all the elements of which the earth and its atmosphere, and all the luminaries connected with it, are composed, shall melt with intense heat." He has much more of the same complexion, but this will suffice. The good Doctor Doddridge takes a similar view, but expresses it very briefly: "The elements of which this goodly frame of nature is composed, being set on fire, shall be dissolved, and the earth and all its works shall be burnt up, so that none of the ornaments of nature or of art shall any longer continue; but the whole shall be one undistinguished heap of smoking desolation." The excellent Matthew Henry treats of it in much the same style, though he seems to verge somewhat nearer towards what must be the true meaning. One commentator says the visible heavens will pass away "with a great whiz." Another calls it "the hissing sound of a dart passing through the air; the flight of birds; the soft motion of the winds; the running of a chariot; the rolling of an impetuous torrent; the noise of soldiers running to battle; the crackling of a wide-spread fire; the rushing sound of a violent storm or tempest." Another remarks of the “elements,” some say “air,” others, “the stars.” One refers it (“elements”) to the heavens, which goes before, and explains it of the electric matter, sulphurous vapors, and whatever floats in the air, together with the air itself.” Another says, “Suppose the earth, air and water shall be subdued by the prevalence of fire ; and their stamina or first constituent principles quite altered thereby ; then it may very properly be said, the elements being on fire shall be dissolved or melted.” These quotations are sufficient to show the views which have almost or quite universally been entertained of the meaning of this passage in Peter. They are altogether of a literal character. For a layman to offer an opinion against such authorities may seem very presumptuous, but the conviction cannot be removed that a much more satisfactory and momentous significance belongs to the passage. As this prediction of Peter undoubtedly refers to the same sublime and fearful tragedy, often repeated under various symbolical forms, in the Scriptures, we will endeavor to ascertain here the meaning of certain symbols used in the prophecy. In the eighteenth verse of the sixteenth chapter of the Revelation, while recounting the troubles to occur in the period between the commencement of the Restoration of the Jews and the close of the forty-five years, among other things mentioned, the Revelator says, "there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth." It may be presumed that few would give the word "earthquake" its literal signification, and suppose it meant a shaking of the physical globe; such a notion would hardly be consistent with the context or with the general matter of the Revelation. "Earthquake," in the symbolical language of Scripture, is by all commentators defined to signify some great civil or religious convulsion. Mr. Faber has it, "An earthquake is a sudden convulsion in an empire, violently oversetting the existing order of things." We must then understand, by this tremendous earthquake, such as was not known since men were upon the earth, the greatest possible revolution in the whole fabric of human society. There are other symbols as striking and impressive as this, such as, "the sun shall be darkened," "the moon turned into blood," and the like, all doubtless referring to the same fearful event; but this one is sufficient for our present purpose.

We begin our inquiries, then, as to the true meaning of the passage under consideration, with the knowledge that such a stupendous revolution is to happen at the time referred to by the apostle; a revolution subverting all the civil and religious governments in the world. We must also understand the fact, which seems to have been overlooked by all who have written on the subject, that this passage of Peter, namely, is as absolutely a prophecy as that of Daniel or Saint John. "In the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise." In prophecy, then, what is the true meaning of "heavens," as a symbol? Sir Isaac Newton has given a catalogue of symbols, with their interpretations. From him we learn that "the symbolical heaven comprehends the sun, the moon, and the stars. In the language of symbols, the sun of a kingdom is the government of that kingdom." There is no known difference of opinion among students on this matter. But if "heaven," in symbolical language, signifies the government of a kingdom, or, by parity of reason, any other government, then, most assuredly, "the heavens," applied in the same way, comprehends something more than one government. In the case before us, the apostle has evidently been discoursing, not of any particular government or country, but of the interests of all mankind. It therefore seems to be a necessary sequence, that in using the term "the heavens" prophetically here, he intended to apply it, and did so apply it, to represent all the governments of the world. This being conceded, we read the passage thus: "After terrible convulsions the governments of the world will be subverted and pass away," for what purpose and to what end we shall see in the sequel.

"And the elements shall melt with fervent heat." While it is easy to show that this proposition is usually misunderstood, it may be readily admitted that its true meaning is more obscure than the former, and admits of more doubt of its exact signification. While it is clear that the "heavens" in the other case has no allusion to the visible firmament; so no more has the word "elements" any relation to what was formerly supposed to be the simple physical constituents of this world—earth, air, fire and water. The Greek word here translated "elements," is stoicheia. This word is used in the epistles six times. In Galatians, 4th chapter and 3d verse, "Even so we when we were children were in bondage under the elements of the world." And in the 9th verse of the same chapter, "But that now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage." Now, whatever any may suppose the true meaning, none can affirm that the word here translated elements, really means the properties of physical nature.

Another place where the same word is used is Colossians, 2d chapter and 8th verse, "Beware lest any man spoil you, through philosophy or vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ." And in the 20th verse of the same chapter, "Wherefore, if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why as though living in the world are ye subject to ordinances (touch not, taste not, handle not, which all are to perish in the using), after the commandment and doctrines of men?" Here it seems quite as apparent that the same Greek word translated "rudiments," does not refer in any manner to the physical elements of our earth. The same Greek word is found in the 5th chapter of Hebrews, 12th verse, where it is translated "principles"—"Ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God." We may then inquire, with some degree of curiosity, why, in the only other place where the word is used, that now under consideration, it should have a popular meaning assigned to it so totally different from what it receives in every other place where it is used? It might be surmised, only to be in keeping with the popular understanding of the preceding sentence. For if the visible heavens, whatever might be understood by the term, were to pass away "with a great whiz," why should not also the "elements" of which the solid earth is composed, and all its surroundings, be melted with fervent heat? In two of the cases cited above from the epistles, the word stoicheia evidently means religious ordinances or ritualistic ceremonies. In the others it has a meaning somewhat different. It is translated "principles," "elements," or "beggarly elements" "of the world, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage." As no one could desire to be in bondage to the four physical elements, we must look further for the signification here. The "elements," or "beggarly elements," in this place doubtless refer to those worldly attractions of wealth, pleasure, etc., to which the children of this world are liable to be inordinately attached, and by which to be destroyed. It is quite possible that both these meanings are here included in the word "elements." But for the sake of simplicity, we confine our view of it to religious ordinances and ritualistic ceremonies in their ecclesiastical aspect. The proper meaning of the Greek word translated "shall melt," is "loosed," "unloosed," or "discharged," and it may with perfect propriety be rendered "abrogated." The word rendered "fervent heat," is more difficult of explanation. It means "being inflamed" or "excited," and may be used in a moral as well as a physical sense. In construing the sentence, the only difficulty seems to be that we have to give an active sense to an inactive subject. Ceremonies and ordinances could not with propriety be said to be inflamed; and as the word appears to be used only for intensifying the sense, we may omit it, leaving the phrase to read, "all human ordinances, ritualisms and legal ceremonies shall be abrogated." The other clause in the verse reads, "The earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burned up." "The earth," according to Sir Isaac Newton, when taken in a temporal sense, imports, in the abstract, the territorial dominions of any Pagan or irreligious empire." "In a spiritual sense, a state of Paganism or apostacy." This is unquestionably its general meaning. In the 46th Psalm, the sixth verse, we have, "The heathen raged, the kingdoms were moved: He uttered his voice, the earth melted." Here we have not only the meaning of the word "earth," but also an opportunity to form a definite appreciation of the word "melt," as used in this connection. It can be, so far as appears, applied only to the destruction of the heathen. In the 10th Psalm, 18th verse, we find, "To judge the fatherless and the oppressed, that the man of the 'earth' may no more oppress." In a broad sense then, the "earth" symbolically includes all who are at enmity with God. The phrase, "shall be burnt up," may with equal propriety be translated, "shall be consumed." The whole paragraph would then read, "All the enemies of God shall be consumed." This construction seems to be fully supported by various passages of Scripture. Malachi in the fourth chapter says: "Behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all they that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of Hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch," "And ye shall tread down the wicked; for they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet, in the day that I shall do this, saith the Lord of Hosts." There can, then, be no reasonable doubt that this whole passage is a figurative description in glowing colors of the same time of trouble mentioned by Daniel, resulting in the subversion of all secular governments, the eradication of all ritualistic ceremonies and ordinances, the overthrow of all ecclesiastical domination, and the utter destruction of the wicked, who shall, at the given time, be upon the earth. With a like purport a passage may be cited from the Revelation, applicable to the same time; that is, the final close of our present dispensation: "And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that had worshiped his image. These were both cast into a lake of fire, burning with brimstone."

If the view of this passage in Peter, thus presented, be correct, then the whole paragraph will read as follows: "The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in the which, in the midst of terrific convulsions, the governments of the world shall all be subverted, and pass away; legal ordinances and ritualistic ceremonies shall be abrogated, ecclesiastical tyranny abolished, and all the enemies of God shall be consumed." "Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." So says Peter, and in almost the same words says the Revelator: "I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away, and there was no more sea." "The sea," we are again informed on the authority of Newton, "ever turbulent and restless, represents nations in a tumultuous and revolutionary state." "And I, John, saw the Holy City, New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God. And he . . . showed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God, having the glory of God." "And I saw no temple therein: for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it." Such, then, seem to be the amazing scenes which are to be enacted upon our earth during and immediately after the time of "trouble such as there never was since there was a nation."

CHAPTER XXI.

CHRIST'S ANSWER TO HIS DISCIPLES.

WE now turn to the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, recording the answer of our Savior to certain questions of his disciples, relating among other things, principally to his own second coming and the end of the world.

“Jesus said to his disciples, See ye not all these things? Verily, I say unto you, there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down.” “And as he sat upon the Mount of Olives, the disciples came unto him privately, saying, Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming? and of the end of the world?” Or, as it is in the original, “the consummation of time.” Here were three distinct questions proposed, which, it would seem, the disciples confounded together, at least, as to time. The first related to the temple; the second, to Christ ; and the third, to the end of our present dispensation. All these questions were answered separately, distinctly and in a manner that admitted of no doubtful construction. Though they are not answered seriatim, an examination of them shall be in the order in which they are proposed. While looking about Jerusalem, and at the temple, Jesus had told them that "not one stone should be left upon another, that should not be thrown down." Their first question related back to this statement, "When shall these things be?" In the fifteenth verse of the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, our Savior undoubtedly answers this question: "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains."

We now turn back to Daniel to ascertain to what our Lord refers. We there find several paragraphs in different places, in the prophecy, embodying nearly the same idea or fact. At present we have only to do with one of them. We have endeavored in a former chapter to show that the "transgression of desolation," mentioned in the thirteenth verse of the eighth chapter, refers to occurrences which did not take place until centuries after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. To what, then, does our Lord refer in his quotation in this conversation with his disciples? It will be remembered that in the ninth chapter, Daniel records a vision, showing forth the time of the coming of the Saviour and of his ministry, and then says: "After threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself: And the people of the Prince that shall come, shall destroy the city and the sanctuary. And the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined." "And for the overspreading of abominations, he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation shall be poured upon the desolate." It will be perceived that the desolation here spoken of immediately follows, in the same vision, the coming, ministry and death of our Lord, and thence may well be presumed to allude to the terrible occurrences to take place immediately thereafter. And to this our Lord undoubtedly refers. In answer therefore to the first question, he cites this prophecy, and warns them, that when they shall see this abomination of desolation, they must expect to witness the fulfillment of his prediction, that there shall not be left one stone upon another; undoubtedly referring to the desolation brought upon Jerusalem, by the army of Titus; and afterwards of Adrian. "In the second year of the reign of Vespasian, A. D. 70, the city of Jerusalem fell into the hands of Titus. It was then given up to be plundered by the soldiers, and most of the inhabitants were put to the sword. In conformity to the orders of Titus, the city was destroyed to its foundations; and even the ruins of the temple were demolished. A plowshare, it is said, was drawn over the consecrated ground, as a sign of perpetual interdiction." Subsequently many Jews returned, and rebuilt some parts of the city; but "in process of time the Jews incensed Adrian, by their turbulent disposition, and he resolved to level the city of Jerusalem with the ground, that is, those buildings which the Jews had erected, to destroy those towers that were left by Titus," "and to sow salt on the ground on which the city had stood. Thus did Titus and Adrian, whatever were their motives, literally fulfill the prediction of our Savior, that neither in the city nor in the temple, should one stone be left upon another." This is a full, definite and perfect answer to the first question of the disciples.

The second question propounded by them was. "What shall be the sign of thy coming?" The comments upon the answer to the first question, by our Lord, are continued to the close of the twenty-second verse. Afterwards, he discourses upon the same subject, but to a more remote period. "Then," which would be much better, more easily understood, and equally correct; "Thereafter, or "After that," if any man shall say unto you, Lo! here is Christ; or Lo! there: believe it not: For there shall arise false Christs and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders, insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." In the same conversation, as recorded by Luke, he says: "They," the people of Jerusalem, at the desolation of Titus, "shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations;" and then his discourse proceeds, as evidently before, probably intentionally, without much regard to order or system to the history of Jerusalem at a later period. "And Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled." This, as has been shown, in a former chapter, refers to the possession of Palestine by the Saracens and Turks; and now, reverting to the question of the disciples, "What shall be the sign of thy coming?" and also recollecting the terrible scourges which are to fall upon our race during the forty-five years predicted by Daniel, He says: "There shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth, distress of nations; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth ; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken," exactly corresponding with what has before been said in the third chapter of the second of Peter : " And then," (that is, afterwards,) " shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven ; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory." Could he have made his answer more clear and intelligible, unless, indeed, he had gone beyond the disciples' inquiry, and given the day and year of our era of his actual appearance ?

We now come to the third and last question, " What " [shall be the sign] " of the end of the world ?" or more properly, " the consummation of time." His answer to this is as brief and explicit as it well could be. " This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world as a witness to all nations ; and then shall the end come." No stronger argument for missions to the heathen can be adduced than is comprised in this short sentence. Here we are informed, by an authority which cannot be disputed, that there has not been an age since he lived in which it was not absolutely at the will of the Christians of the existing generation to bring about the end of the world or the close of our dispensation. But on this point all Christians appear, until a few years, to have been thoughtless in the extreme, making no, or very little, effort to fulfill Christ's last command to go into all the world and preach the gospel. The desire to convert mankind is doubtless a strong impelling motive and a very powerful one to prosecute foreign missions. But if this were the only one, there would be room for discouragement. The efforts of the most self-denying and laborious ministers may be futile. Missionaries have been known to preach for nearly twenty years without a convert; and if we cast a look over Christian countries, we see so small a part of the existing population evangelically pious, that the most determined zeal might flag if the conversion of the world was the end required by God. But there is no such command given here. Christ's injunction upon his disciples is imperative, to go into all the world and preach the gospel. And then here he solemnly affirms that "this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness to all nations. And this is all. We are not to wait a single day for the conversion of the world. "Then shall the end come." The command and the promise are equally obligatory and full, even if a single heathen had never been or never should be converted ; and whether one shall ever be converted or not, every Christian is bound by the most solemn obligations to labor to effect this end—the proclamation of the gospel to all nations. So far as the effect is concerned, our duty being done, we have no responsibility. That the preaching of the gospel will not be altogether successful, we may well infer from the intimation everywhere given in Scripture, that at the great day of the Lord, immense numbers will still be his enemies, and will be turned into hell.

“This generation,” says our Savior, “shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled.” The word “generation” as used here, has occasioned a good deal of doubt and difficulty, which might easily have been removed. It has largely been understood as only meaning an ordinary age of man, while the original word, although correctly translated “generation,” ordinarily, yet may, with perfect propriety, in this place be “dispensation”—the word meaning “an age,” in its largest sense, as the “golden age,” the “age of chivalry,” etc. ; so the paragraph should read: “This dispensation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled.”

Speaking of the same amazing occurrences, just recited by our Lord, the prophet Joel in the second chapter and tenth verse, says: “The earth shall quake before them ; the heavens shall tremble ; the sun and moon shall be dark ; and the stars shall withdraw their shining ; and the Lord shall utter his voice before his army ; for his camp is very great ; for he is strong that executeth his words ; for the day of the Lord is very terrible, and who can abide it ?”

So in the thirtieth verse, “ And I will show wonders in the heavens, and in the earth, blood and fire and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come.” So in the gospel according to Mark, thirteenth chapter and twenty-fourth verse, we have the same conversation of Christ with his disciples as quoted from Matthew, varying somewhat in phraseology : “ But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars of heaven shall fall, and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken.” And to the same purport is the statement in the sixth chapter of the Revelation, from the twelfth to the seventeenth verse, inclusive. Recurring again to the explanation of the Scriptural symbols we find, “ the symbolical heaven, when interpreted temporally, signifies the whole body politic. As such it comprehends the sun, or the sovereign power, whereso-ever it be lodged; the moon, or the people, which is the allegorical wife of the sovereign power, and the stars, or the princes and nobles of the realm.” “Such being the case, the blackening of the sun, the turning the moon into blood, the falling of the stars and the departing of the heavens like a scroll, will mean either the subversion of a kingdom or the subversion of an empire, according as the tenor of the prophecy shall require.” A consideration of all these prophecies brings us to the conclusion that there will be a period, according to Daniel, of forty-five years, in which—and in this he is corroborated by numerous other prophecies—there will be a condition of the world involving unexampled tumults and convulsions, with unspeakable tribulations; that immediately after these troubles shall have passed, and consequent upon them, all the governments of the world, secular and ecclesiastical, will be subverted and extinguished, and all the enemies of God consumed; and all this, that the whole earth may be purified as by fire, and the new Jerusalem prepared for a reign of righteousness, when the tabernacle of God shall be with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and the throne of God and the Lamb shall be in it.” “And He that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them.”

CHAPTER XXII.

THE COMING OF OUR LORD.

WE now approach the consummation and glorious climacteric of God's Christian dispensation to men. While Christ himself tells us that immediately after those tribulations the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, the prophet Joel says what might seem, at first sight, contradictory; namely, that "the sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come." This is, however, in perfect consistency with all the events so minutely and graphically recorded.

First come the forty-five years of trouble, such as has not been known since men inhabited our world. Then in the order of events follows the subversion of the whole fabric of society, civil and ecclesiastical. "And then," says our Savior, in the 30th verse of the 24th chapter of Matthew, "and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn: and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory: and he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." In the second of Thessalonians, first chapter and 7th and 8th verses: "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." It will be seen from these quotations, that while Joel in his prophecy refers to the terrible tribulations which precede the coming of our Savior, and desolate the world for the period of forty-five years, our Savior in his discourse refers to the equally, and, perhaps, still more, awful woes, which succeed his coming: the first relating more particularly to the tumults and convulsions of a secular nature, while the last evidently relates to the judgment of Christ, taking vengeance on those who know not God.

The whole of this scene of tribulation and sorrow and anguish, simultaneously with the coming of our Lord, is strikingly presented to us in the 6th chapter of Revelation, verses 12th to the end of the chapter, inclusive: "And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and lo! there was a great earthquake, and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair; and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell to the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind; and the heaven departed as a scroll when it its rolled together; and every mountain and island were removed out of their places; and the kings of the earth, and the great men and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman and every freeman, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains, and said to the mountains and the rocks, Fall on us and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the lamb, for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?"

The coming of our Lord is further exemplified by St. Paul in his first epistle to the Thessalonians, the 4th chapter and 15th verse: "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent them which are asleep." "For (at this eventful period) the Lord himself shall descend from heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first."

In the minds of many the second appearance of our Lord has not only been questioned, but has become apocryphal. In addition to the unanswerable inference from what has been already written, several more passages from the books of the New Testament may be cited. In the 27th verse of the 24th chapter of Matthew, our Lord himself says: "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." And in the 25th chapter and 31st verse, "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory, and before him shall be gathered all the nations, and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." In the Acts of the Apostles, in the 9th verse of the 1st chapter, we are told that while the apostles beheld, "he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight," "and while they looked steadfastly towards heaven as he went up, two men stood by them in white apparel, which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner, as ye have seen him go into heaven." In the first of Corinthians, first chapter and seventh verse, Paul says: "So that ye come behind in no gift, waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." So in the first chapter of the first of Thessalonians, tenth verse, "And to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead." Also the nineteenth verse of the second chapter: "For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?" And in the thirteenth verse of the third chapter: "To the end he may establish your hearts, unblamable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, with all his saints." In the twenty-third verse of the fifth chapter, he says: "And I pray God, your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless, unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." To the same purport, in the second of Thessalonians, first chapter and seventh verse: "When the Lord Jesus Christ shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire." And in the eighth verse of the second chapter: "Then shall that wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming." So in the fifth verse of the third chapter: "And the Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ." In the Epistle of James, fifth chapter and seventh and eighth verses: "Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord." "Establish your hearts, for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh." In the second chapter of the first of John, twenty-eighth verse: "And now, little children, abide in him; that when he shall appear, we may have confidence and not be ashamed before him at his coming."

The mere reading these, and like passages scattered through the New Testament, seem to convey instant conviction to the mind, that they shadow forth the time mentioned by Daniel, when he says: "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty years."

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE MILLENNIUM.

IN the twentieth chapter of the Revelation of Saint John, and sixth verse, we are informed in language very similar to that of Daniel: "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection. On such the second death hath no power; but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." This is what is usually denominated the millennium. Of the state and condition of this period, it would gratify our curiosity, at least, could we be more fully advised than Revelation enlightens us. But it cannot be denied, that while the fact of such a consummation is affirmed, with unquestionable certainty, very meagre information is communicated to us in relation to the peculiar conditions which surround God's people during its blessed continuance. In the first and second verses of the same chapter, it is said ; " I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand, and he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years." And in the fourth verse : " I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them ; and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus and for the word of God, and which had not worshiped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands ; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." That " great serpent, the Devil and Satan," tempted our first parents to their mortal sin ; and from that time till the present, he has been going about like a " roaring lion," seeking whom he might devour. As one of the grand features of this blessed season, no single fact could be more appropriate, necessary and blissful than the dispossession of Satan of his power, so long exercised to the ruin of vast multitudes of our race. Although in Daniel nothing is said which defines the duration of this period, yet the correspondence between his vision in the seventh chapter and this of St. John is very striking and impressive : " I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool; his throne was the fiery flame, his wheels burning fire; a fiery stream issued and came forth before him; thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him; the judgment was set and the books were opened. I beheld then, because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake; I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame.” “I saw in the night visions, and behold one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve him.” The sixteenth chapter of Isaiah would seem to meet the contingencies of no other period of the world’s history: “Violence shall no more be heard in thy land; wasting nor destruction within thy borders: but thou shalt call thy walls salvation and thy gates praise. The sun shall be no more thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee; but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory. Thy sun shall no more go down; neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended. Thy people also shall be all righteous; they shall inherit the land forever, the branch of my planting, the work of my hands, that I may be glorified." So the like facts are reaffirmed in the sixty-fifth chapter: "Behold, I create new heavens, and a new earth; and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. Be ye glad and rejoice forever: for behold I create Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy; and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying." Isaiah also in the eleventh chapter refers in strong terms to the same blessed period: "The wolf shall also dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. The sucking child shall play upon the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den; they shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain." In Zechariah we are told "the Lord shall be king over all the earth."

But nearly all we can learn of this happy period, we gather from the Apocalypse: "After this I beheld, and lo! a great multitude which no man could number, of all nations and kindreds and people and tongues, stood before the throne and before the lamb, clothed with white robes and palms in their hands; and cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God, which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb." "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away, and there was no more sea." We repeat what was before quoted of this symbol from Faber: "The sea, ever turbulent and restless, represents nations in a tumultuary or revolutionary state." This indicates a condition of perfect peace, when swords shall be beaten into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks. "And I, John, saw the holy city, New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people; and God himself shall be with them and be their God." "And he carried me away in the spirit to a great and high mountain, and showed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God, having the glory of God; and I saw no temple therein; for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it. And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it; for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof. And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it." "And there shall be no more curse; but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it; and his servants shall serve him, and they shall see his face; and there shall be no night there." Such is the condition, so far as known, of God's people during this succession of blissful years.

In the third verse of the twentieth chapter of Revelation, we are told that after this happy experience of a thousand years, in which Satan had been bound, crippled, and, doubtless, divested of all power to influence and pervert mankind, "he must be loosed a little season." And in the seventh verse and onward: "And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go about to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle." How earnestly soever we may desire to pry into the polity and condition of this world at the time and before Gog and Magog shall thus meet in deadly conflict, we cannot even frame a theory applicable to it, inasmuch as He, who has revealed so much, has seen fit to close up the books, and leave us in ignorance. Our aspirations must therefore cease with the close of our own dispensation, and all the rest of our knowledge must be derived from the fruition of Heaven, as it may be hereafter experienced, or from some future revelation.

CHAPTER XXIV.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION.

HAVING thus given our views of this most wonderful prophecy, so far as the "times" mentioned by Daniel are concerned, we have now only to present a summary of our argument, that the reader may the more perfectly comprehend our whole theory. The first six chapters of Daniel relate to matters entirely distinct from those which are revealed in the last six ; which last six alone form the subject of consideration in this argument.

Beginning with the ninth chapter, Daniel there informs us, that in the first year of Darius the Mede, namely the year 560 before Christ, "he set his face unto the Lord," evidently making supplication as to matters relating to the seventy years of the desolation of Jerusalem. He received an answer, but upon a subject differing greatly from that which formed the burden of his prayer. He is informed of the birth, ministry and death of Messiah, that he shall be cut off, but not for himself. He also foretells the destruction of Jerusalem, soon after, and the "overspreading of abominations" "until the consummation shall be poured upon the desolate." Upon this we present no new view, as all Christians have, from the first, so far as known, agreed in their application and fulfillment.

Here commences our departure from the system of interpretation heretofore given by those who have taken the subject in hand. Our theory assumes that the last six chapters of Daniel relate to, and only to, the Christian dispensation, excepting so far as other matters become incidentally and closely connected with the purposes of that dispensation, and that, treated in this light, the prophecy becomes a symmetrical and almost perfect photograph of the trials, successes, discouragements, persecutions and final victory of God's people.

Two years after the vision recorded in the ninth chapter, namely, in the first year of the reign of Belshazzar, he had another vision, with a part of which, relating, as is supposed, to Roman history, previous to the delivery of the saints into the power of anti-christ, we do not meddle, as it is one-side of the plan herein proposed. After those revelations, suddenly his vision extended down to the very close of the Christian dispensation, until the final victory of the "Ancient of days." At his request an interpretation was given, resulting in the same victorious conclusion: "I beheld until the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them; until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High, and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom." In his explanation the person of whom Daniel inquired informed him that he (the same persecuting power) "shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand, until a time, and times and the dividing of time. But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion to consume and to destroy it unto the end." Assuming the delivery of the saints into the hand of this persecuting power to have been the investing of Boniface with the Supreme Pontificate, in the year 607, it seems a necessary consequence that this power must be consumed and finally destroyed in the year 1867.

In the eighth chapter, he has recorded another vision principally relating to the "ram" and "he-goat," and after giving an account of their victories and defeats, Daniel is informed that the sanctuary shall be cleansed in (according to the Septuagint) two thousand four hundred years. And he is again informed by a vision in the tenth chapter that the time for consuming will last twenty-one years, which two thousand four hundred and twenty-one years, from the time the answer was given, would end in the year 1867, coinciding exactly with the end of the former time, times and half a time. Thus the period alluded to and foretold is shown by two distinct processes of reasoning, founded upon two distinct prophecies, and should end in the same year 1867.

The next great event in the history of the church is the rise and progress of Mahometanism, and its overspreading and subjecting to its domination the Holy Land. It is shown that the Holy City, Jerusalem, was subjugated by the Mahometan power in 637, and from Christ and St. John, as well as from Daniel, that this subjugation shall continue for the space of 1260 years. In Daniel, twelfth chapter and seventh verse, we are assured that this domination shall continue for a "time, times and a half;" while in the Revelation of St. John we are told that the Holy City shall be trodden down of the gentiles "forty and two months," which, in prophetic language, implies the same time exactly.

But in addition to these two processes of proof, founded upon two widely different prophecies, Daniel, as if to leave us without excuse for misunderstanding him, in the answer to another question is informed that it shall be 1290 years, not from the taking of Jerusalem, from which epoch the former time must be reckoned, but "from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away," and the abomination that maketh desolate be set up. Now as we have proved, in discoursing upon another portion of the prophecy, that this was when Boniface was made Universal Bishop, in 607, the 1290 will end in 1897, precisely the time when, according to St. John, Jerusalem shall cease to be trodden down of the Gentiles. Here are three distinct prophecies, made at different times, by two different prophets, under very different circumstances, all culminating in precisely the same year of our era.

The main part of the eleventh chapter is, it cannot be doubted, devoted to what is commonly known as the "Holy Wars," in which the Saracens and Turks have acted so distinguished a part. The third, fourth and fifth verses are so clearly drawn as to leave, apparently, no room for doubt that they are intended to describe the wars and ruin of Chosroes and the initiation of the power of the Caliphs over Palestine. We are then told, in the sixteenth verse: "He shall stand in the glorious land, which by his hand shall be consumed;" and after recounting more battles, in the thirty-sixth verse, he "shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished; for that that is determined shall be done." And then in the forty-fifth verse, apparently after all controversy has ceased, and he has planted the tabernacles of his palace between the seas, in the glorious holy mountain, we are further assured that "he shall come to his end, and none shall help him."

It will thus be seen that these six chapters of Daniel, commencing with the ninth and including the seventh and eighth, after giving an account of the Messiah and the consequent and immediate woes of Jerusalem, relate almost entirely to the twin delusions of Rome and Mahomet, referring to little else but what was incidentally and necessarily connected with them.

In the twelfth chapter he condenses more amazing and soul-stirring events than may be found in any other chapter in all the Bible. First, Daniel was informed that at the close, and simultaneously with the overthrow of the Mahometan power in Palestine, "Michael shall stand up, who standeth for the children of thy people;" giving him assurance that at that time a change will commence in the destinies of the Jews, and that change will be a happy one, and sustained by a power that cannot be resisted.

Second, He was informed that at that time "should commence also a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation;" by the phraseology clearly indicating that this trouble will not be limited in its operation to a single nation. This time of trouble is referred to and enlarged upon by almost every prophet, both of the Old and New Testament; it is presented in every possible form of description, using the most powerful and impressive symbols, and evidently extending its baleful influence and withering calamities to all the people of the earth.

Thirdly, He was further informed that at that time, and probably during the continuance and at the close of these tribulations, "thy people," that is, the people of the Jews, "shall be delivered," "every one that shall be found written in the book." Of this restoration of the Jews, the other prophets are full; but precisely how long these troubles and the process of restoration will last, we are not informed, except inferentially, from a subsequent statement of Daniel, which, however, seems to be very decisive.

In the fourth place, we are further informed that at that time, either during this time of unspeakable woe to our race, or immediately thereafter, "many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." The same astounding event appears to be recognized and reaffirmed in the twentieth chapter of the Apocalypse: "I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and (those) which had not worshiped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands, and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection."

Fifth, Passing over the "time, times and a half," in the seventh verse, which has been sufficiently considered before, we find an angel, clothed in linen, under the most solemn oath ever taken, swearing by Him that liveth forever and ever, that when he shall have accomplished his own purposes, in the dispersion of his people, that is, when their restoration shall have been completed, then "all these things shall be finished."

Sixth, Again passing over another prophecy of 1290 years, which has been sufficiently commented upon, we come to the last and crowning announcement of his whole prophecy: "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days" (years).

If the premises assumed in this argument be well taken, and the reasoning be not defective, this blessed consummation must be fulfilled in or about the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and forty-two, or forty-five years after the time mentioned in the first verse, which seems to be unmistakably fixed in the year 1897, and then will Jesus Christ the righteous exercise unlimited "dominion from sea to sea and from the river to the end of the earth."

"Let every kindred, every tribe
On this terrestrial ball,
To Him all majesty ascribe,
And crown Him Lord of all."

THE END.

Deacidified using the Bookkeeper process.
Neutralizing agent: Magnesium Oxide
Treatment Date: June 2005

PreservationTechnologies
A WORLD LEADER IN PAPER PRESERVATION

111 Thomson Park Drive
Cranberry Township, PA 16066
(724) 779-2111

BS
1555

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

0 014 380 898 1